PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

The present volume contains the Exchequer accounts rendered during the last six years of the reign of James II., or from 1455 to 1460 inclusive. The audits took place in the summer or autumn of each of these years at Edinburgh, Linlithgow, or Perth. The rolls of the custumars and bailies of the burghs, and also of the managers of the Crown lands, are complete. There are two rolls of the Sheriffs, containing the accounts audited in 1455 and 1456, a separate account of the Comptroller for 1456, and a few miscellaneous accounts inserted in the already mentioned rolls.

The rebellion of James ninth and last Earl of Douglas had been to appearance put down in 1452, and the Earl himself ostensibly received into favour. But his secret disaffection continued, and was fomented by the English government. On 22nd May 1453, he had a safe-conduct, in which his brothers were included, and he himself was designed Earl of Douglas, Wigtown and Annandale, and Lord of Galloway, to pass with a large following through England to Rome;[1] and a similar passport was at the same time given to Hamilton. But it does not appear that either Douglas or Hamilton proceeded further than England; and the English records throw some light on their movements. On 17th June 1453, Malise, Earl of Strathern (formerly Earl of Menteith), was liberated from the captivity in which he had been held for twenty-five years as a hostage for the ransom of the King who had so deeply wronged him, this being done at the instance and on the petition of the Earl of Douglas and Lord Hamilton,[2] and the evident motive being to involve James II. in trouble by a revival of the old question regarding the respective rights of the two families of Robert II. On 19th February 1453–4, a disbursement of £16, 13s. 4d. occurs in the English Exchequer accounts to Garter King of Arms for a journey undertaken by him to the borders to make certain appointments with the Earl of Douglas, for more than five weeks' attendance on Lord Hamilton in London and elsewhere, and for six weeks' attendance on the King while an answer was prepared to the Commissioners and the Earl of Douglas, who was then in these parts.[3]

We are ignorant of the exact mode in which Douglas's revolt broke out. Perhaps the King obtained unequivocal evidence of his traffickings with England, his complicity with Donald Balloch, and the insincerity of his submission, and felt himself strong enough by a powerful effort to crush the Douglas influence for ever. The campaign was conducted on James's part with extraordinary vigour and celerity. In the beginning of March 1454–5, the Asloan MS. tells us, the King "kest doune the castell of Inveravyne,"[1] a place whose ruins, near the mouth of the Avon, may still be traced. A march to Glasgow followed, whence, with a force of westland men and Highlanders, he proceeded to Lanark. At Lanark—as appears from the narrative in the Act of Forfeiture against the Douglases—an armed encounter occurred between the King's forces and the adherents of the Earl of Douglas.[2] The King is said to have successively wasted with fire and sword Douglasdale, Avondale, and the country of the Hamiltons. Returning to Edinburgh he then made a dash into Ettrick Forest with a lowland force, compelling the whole gentry to follow his standard under pain of having their lands burned and their houses pulled down.[3]

James next proceeded in person to besiege Douglas's castle of Abercorn. Of the siege of Abercorn and later proceedings we have the King's own account in an interesting letter to Charles VII.[1] From this source we learn that the siege began on Easter week, that is the first week of April.[2] On the seventh day of the siege, according to the Asloan MS.,[3] Hamilton, who had shortly before been making unsuccessful efforts to obtain pecuniary aid for the rebels in England, was induced by the persuasions of his uncle, Sir James Livingston, to come over to the King's side with his whole following, and put himself and his lands at James's unconditional disposal. He was received into favour, though placed for a time in Rosslyn Castle under custody of the Earl of Orkney; and his desertion of the Douglases contributed greatly to James's further successes. Hamilton, in his account as Sheriff of Lanark, a post in which he soon replaced Livingston, is allowed £10 "pro feodo suo, laboribus et expensis factis signanter tempore guerrarum."[4]

[1] Asloan MS., pp. 12, 53.

[2] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 76. In the accounts rendered by the Sheriff of Lanark in 1456, 20s. are allowed to the wife of John Yuletoun, the King's hostess, when at Lanark in time of war.—Page 161.

[3] The Sheriff of Edinburgh, in his account for the two years ending July 1456, is allowed 16s. 8d. for his expenses in the transmission of the King's letters for assembling the host (page 145); an entry which, however, may perhaps refer to the border raid of 1456.

There was no loss of life on the King's side, according to the Asloan MS., until St. George's day (23d April), when Alan Pantour, the most ingenious man in Scotland, and most subtle in many divers things, was slain with an arrow

Major, however, refers to the currency of a report containing the germ of Boece's story.

"throw misgovernyng of himself," and was much missed by the King and Lords. Many of the towers were, according to the same authority, struck down by "the gret gun, the quhilk a Frenchman schot richt wele, and falyeit na shot within a faldome quhar it was charged him to hit."[1] A hiatus occurs in the MS. immediately after these words; but James's letter tells us that at the end of the month the place was taken by escalade and razed to the ground, and the principal defenders of it hanged.

We find the custumars of Linlithgow credited with military engines (instrumentis), carriages, iron, timber, barrels, and other necessaries for the siege and destruction of the castle of Abercorn and tower of Inveravon,[2] and the Sheriff of Linlithgow with £3, 5s. for engines for the siege of Abercorn, namely, five-score spades and trowels (vangis et tribulis), eleven "pikkis" and five mattocks.[3] The custumars of Edinburgh are allowed 24s. for a helmet bought by them and delivered to David Smyth at the time of the siege, 50s. for a bombard and three "chambers," besides large sums for putting Edinburgh Castle, and more especially its great tower, in a state of defence.[4]

In the meantime the King's cause had been prospering elsewhere. The Earl of Douglas had escaped to England; but his brothers of Ormond, Moray, and Balveny, who, betaking themselves to the recesses of Ewisdale, had harassed the adjoining districts of Annandale, were encountered on 1st May at Arkinholm on the Esk by a force composed of the chief border families and their adherents, and sustained a decisive defeat.[1] Among the slain was Moray, whose head was brought to the King when still before Abercorn. Ormond was taken and afterwards executed. The castles of Douglas and Strathavon, and other smaller places of strength belonging to the Douglases, voluntarily surrendered, and were demolished, Threave alone holding out against the royal forces.

Threave or Treve Castle, the chief fortress of the Douglases in Galloway, where the followers of the Earl made their last stand against the King, was a place of great strength. A large armed retinue had been kept there by the last two Earls, and it is said to have been a boast of Earl William that the gallows-knob at Threave had not been without a tassel for fifty years. The English records inform us that before the 15th July 1455 Threave had been formally made over by Douglas to the King of England, in return for 400 marks granted for its succour, victualling, relief, and rescue.[2]

The siege, which was of considerable duration,

[1] Several notices occur of grants of land or remissions of fines in consideration of services at that conflict.—Pages 553, 557.

must have begun some time before the Parliament which met on 9th June 1455, and was going on when James wrote the letter of 8th July already adverted to. One of the first references to it in the Exchequer accounts, is an allowance to the custumars of Edinburgh for 6½ dozen ells of canvas and 15 ells of coloured buckram furnished by them to Duncan Talyour, to make a small tent to be used at the siege of Threave.[1] But by far the larger number of the entries relating to the siege are connected with the bombards, and their carriage from Linlithgow and back again. While these pieces of ordnance are sometimes mentioned in the plural, one of them has par excellence the designation of the King's great bombard. There is a current tradition that the piece of ordnance now at Edinburgh Castle, known as Mons Meg, was not only used at this siege, but fabricated on the spot by a Kirkcudbright blacksmith, each of the inhabitants of the burgh contributing a bar of iron towards its completion. It is scarcely necessary to point out the absurdity of the idea of a gun, which would have required all the skill of Flanders and the most perfect appliances of the age to pro duce, being constructed by a country artificer in the hurry of a siege; but there seems considerable probability in the suggested identity between "Mons" and the "magna bombarda" alluded to in the rolls in connection with the sieges of Hatton, Blackness, and Threave.[1] William Earl of Orkney, the Chancellor, accompanied the great bombard to Threave;[2] and John Were, burgess of Linlithgow, and Friar Andrew Lisouris the King's carpenter, are specified as having charge of it.[3] The recorded payments directly connected with the bombards, including their conveyance to and from the siege, exceed £110.[4] That monster guns could be transported from one part of the country to another, along roads which were no better than bridle-paths, seems to suggest that Scotland was not so backward in constructive skill as has been sometimes imagined; and the occasional fracture of a cart-wheel by the way is not to be wondered at.

The King, though he cannot have been present at the outset of the siege, for a time conducted it

[1] Treasurer's Accounts, vol. i., preface, p. ccxvii. Mons is mentioned by name in 1488, ibid., p. 115. It was perhaps one of the bombards imported from Flanders by James I., of which John Turyne's account (vol. iv. page 681) speaks. If Bower's account of the large bombard called the "Lion," imported by James I., can be relied on (Scotichronicon, l. xvi. c. 16), it was of brass, and therefore cannot be identified with Mons.

in person.[1] The Abbot of Tongland was compensated for the destruction of his grain by the horses of the King, when at that religious house at the time of the siege,[2] and some of the King's attendants were left behind at the monasteries of Tongland and Dundrennan.[3]

On what terms Threave eventually capitulated we do not know; but, besides smaller sums paid from the fermes of Galloway to John Fraser, steward of Threave before its surrender, and to a John Quhiting who was in the castle at the time of the siege,[4] there is a payment of £50 to John Dunbar and others who were with him in the castle of Threave at the time of the capitulation. This Dunbar is often afterwards referred to in the accounts in such a way as to show that he was a trusted and valued servant of the King, as he had formerly been of the Douglases.[5]

Threave, on its surrender, was garrisoned by the King, and placed under the custody of Sir Alexander Boyd of Drumcoll,[6] who was soon afterwards superseded in favour of William Edmondston, son of Sir William Edmondston of Culloden, and cousin-german of the King.[7] Lochmaben was about the same time garrisoned, victualled, and placed under the charge of Andrew Stewart, Warden of the west March, afterwards Lord Avondale.[8]

While the siege of Threave was going on, a Parliament was sitting at Edinburgh, at which the principal business transacted was the forfeiture of the Douglases. The Earl of Douglas was attainted on the 10th of June 1455, and on the 12th of the same month decree of attainder was pronounced against his mother the Countess Beatrix, and his brothers, Archibald "pretended" Earl of Moray, and John Douglas of Balveny. The crimes charged against the Earl of Douglas included the garrisoning and fortifying the castles of Threave, Douglas, Strathavon, and Abercorn against the King; leaguing with the English; appearing in arms against the King near Lanark; aiding his brothers in their rebellions; burning the town of Dalkeith, and pillaging the country around it; with three other acts, only known from their being here narrated, namely, plundering the grange of Abernethy the Justiciary;[1] doing what he could to aid Robert Douglas in depriving the King of his succession to Strabrock and burning the grange of Colinden (Colinton near Edinburgh), then in ward to the King.[2] The crimes of which the Earl's mother, Beatrix Douglas, was convicted, were fortifying against the King the castles of Abercorn,

[1] In the printed Act of Attainder (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 75), which is taken from a not very carefully written transcript in Sir Lewis Stewart's collections in the Advocates' Library, the words "Henrici domini Abernethy" are an obvious clerical slip for "Laurencii domini Abernethy." Douglas, and Strathavon, placing rebels in the first-named castle, burning the King's lands of Kingcavel and Bonington, near Linlithgow, as also Warnestoun (Warristoun), and generally abetting her sons James, Archibald, Hugh, and John, in their leagues with England, and other crimes. The treasonable acts specified against Archibald "pretended" Earl of Moray were garrisoning and fortifying Lochindorb and Darnaway castles against the King; and John Douglas was charged with garrisoning Abercorn, leaguing with the English, and aiding his brothers. Hugh Earl of Ormond is not included in the act of attainder, but the Exchequer accounts leave no doubt that decree of forfeiture was also pronounced against him.[1]

Of date 16th June 1455, that is, four days after their forfeiture, the Countess Beatrix and John Douglas of Balveny had, in conjunction with the Countess Margaret (the "Fair Maid of Galloway"), a safe-conduct to visit England;[2] and on the 4th August following the English government granted to the Earl of Douglas an annuity of £500 for services to be done to the English Crown—to be continued till he be restored to his estates, described in accordance with the common phraseology of English state papers of that date, as "taken from him by him that calleth himself King of Scots," it being provided that the annuity shall be restricted to one-half in the event of his regaining half his property.[1]

A thank-offering at this date of a great candle containing a stone of wax may be reasonably connected with the suppression of the Douglas revolt.[2] It was made in the chapel of the Convent of St. Mary in the Fields—an ancient foundation, whose site acquired notoriety in the following century as the scene of the murder of Queen Mary's husband.

The Estates were twice again convened in the course of the year 1455—at Edinburgh on the 4th August, and at Stirling on the 13th October. At the Parliament of August the Douglas forfeitures were followed up by stringent prohibitions against aiding or harbouring the Earl or any of his people; and an Act was passed[3] attaching certain lordships and castles inalienably to the Crown, including such portions of the Douglas estates as were not immediately about to be alienated to nobles who had aided in the overthrow of the Douglas power. The authority of the March Warden was much circumscribed, and his office was deprived of its hereditary character. Of the accounts of the newly acquired lands,—on which it will be necessary to make some separate observations,—it may be here remarked that they are full of valuable details regarding the King's movements during the last few years of his reign, and his attempts to establish order in the outlying parts of his dominions.

The October Parliament laid down minute regulations regarding the defence of the March, and the transmission of intelligence of an English invasion by a system of beacon-fires. Garrisons were to be placed along the east, middle, and west borders; and it was provided that the number of men furnished by each baron or freeholder should be proportionate to his means and estate, as determined by an inquest before the Sheriff.[1]

A few days before the meeting of the October Parliament, on the 8th of the month, the Rolls inform us of the King being at Lanark, where his expenses amounted to £15.[2]

From the letter of James II. of 8th July 1455, already alluded to, we learn, that at some period between the suppression of the Douglas revolt and its date an attempt had been made to capture Berwick by surprise; but through the furtive escape of an Englishman who had been admitted into Scotland by a safe-conduct, the Scottish plans were betrayed, the place was suddenly put in a state of defence, and the invaders retired. At the close of the letter James adds that he is then contemplating a fresh attack on Berwick with larger resources, in which he hopes for aid from France. A note of instructions, furnished by the King of Scots to the Bishop of Galloway and other ambassadors about to proceed to the Court of Charles VII. on 20th November, contains a statement that James has then a large army in the field, which he cannot continue to maintain without assistance; and it is proposed that, taking advantage of the present internal dissensions in England, an attack should be made simultaneously by the French on Calais and by the Scots on Berwick.[1]

Some attempts, however, seem soon afterwards to have been made at negotiation with England, perhaps in consequence of a slight temporary ascendancy of the Lancastrian party. On January 14th, 1455–6, a safe-conduct appears in the English records to the Bishops of St. Andrews and Brechin, the Abbot of Melrose, Master Nicholas of Otterburn, Sir Andrew Stewart, Warden of the west March, Livingston the Chamberlain, Lords Montgomery and Hamilton, William Cranston, and Patrick Cockburn, to visit England;[2] and at the next following audit in the accounts of the custumars and bailies of Haddington, sums are allowed, amounting in all to £40, to Otterburn and Cockburn for their expenses as ambassadors.[3] A letter by James II., to Charles VII., of date 28th June 1456, adverts to endeavours which have lately been made by the Scottish King to obtain redress for injuries committed by England, or to conclude a treaty of permanent peace, which have proved entirely fruitless. In the same letter he dissuades Charles from making peace with England, and again suggests a united attack by France and Scotland on the common foe. For this purpose he despatches a new embassy to the French Court, consisting of Sir James Douglas of Lugton,[1] John Kennedy, provost of the college of St. Andrews, George Abernethy, provost of the college of Dumbarton, and John Dalrymple, whose name we often encounter under the designation of "King's merchant."[2]

The actual state of the relations with England at this period is sufficiently indicated by a document, of date 26th July 1455, and headed in the Rotuli Scotiæ "Ad regem Scotiæ epistola rixosa et minabunda."[3] It is addressed to Prince James, asserting himself to be King of Scots; and after assuming it to be a matter of notoriety that Scotland belongs to the monarch of Great Britain as superior, it alludes to a message full of boastfulness, levity, and contumely sent by "one Lyon your alleged Herald and King of Arms."[4] James is charged in [4] The aggressions of which James had had reason to complain probably included certain raids across the east border, of which we have unmistakeable indications in the accounts rendered at the next audit. In the account of Patrick Lord Hailes, as Sheriff of Berwick, rendered 4th October 1456, the fermes of Luchirmacus (£15) and Rachburn (£10) are remitted "propter vasti-terms of downright abuse, unique in diplomatic communications, with breach of faith and treason to his liege lord; and the communication ends by the expression of the English King's purpose to chastise the insolence, rebellion, and arrogance of his vassal.

We know not whether James made any reply to this strange epistle, other than leading a hostile force towards the English border. That expedition, we are told, had proceeded as far as Cayle or Cale,[1] when the King was met by two English ambassadors, by whose "fraudulent promise" he was induced to abandon his purpose. The fraud, however, was speedily discovered; and within twenty days the King, with a larger force than before, re-entered Northumberland, wasting it with fire and sword, and levelling whatever castles, towns, or fortalices were in his way; and returned home, as the continuator of Bower informs us,[2] with great triumph and honour. Mair tells the same story with less detail.[3] Boece converts the "two tatem earundem tempore guerre" (page 184). The same sheriff, who had been ordered to distrain for the castle wards of the lands of Polwart, Hume, and Lambden, amounting to £18 or £19, found nothing on these lands to distrain "propter guerras Anglicorum" (page 185). Sir Archibald Douglas of Cavers, Sheriff of Roxburgh, is on the same ground allowed the whole castle wards of his sheriffdom and the fermes of Fallinche and of Stitchel (page 187); and in the account of the Earldom of March, the fermes of Colbrandspath and Gradane are remitted in respect of these lands having been pillaged by the English (page 261).

ambassadors" of the Scotichronicon and Mair into an Englishman, perfect in the Italian tongue, suborned by Henry, pretending to have a commission from the Pope to prohibit hostilities, and a monk in his company. Pinkerton conjectures that the ambassadors appeared as from Henry VI., falsely representing that he was restored to power, and urging that James's quarrel was not with him, but with the Duke of York.[1]

This raid is alluded to in certain answers sent by Charles VII., in January 1456–7, to proposals submitted to him by the Scots ambassadors, which begin by congratulations addressed to James on hearing that he had entered England with a large army, and continued there for a long time.[2] It seems also to be the same expedition which is described in the Auchinleck Chronicle as James II.s' "first voyage into England," and has come to be misplaced there among the events of 1459.[3] James is there asserted to have set out on the 16th August with 600,000 (?) men, and burned and harried to the distance of twenty miles, winning and destroying seventeen towers and fortalices, and remaining in England six days and six nights. The invasion is said to have been a successful one. On James's return, we are told, an English host, including the Duke of York and Earl of Salisbury, approached the Scottish March, but, in consequence of dissension among its leaders, fell to pieces without doing anything.

The account of the Earldom of March, rendered 4th October 1456, contains a payment of 19s. for provisions ("mullones" and rabbits) furnished by the Comptroller, and their carriage from Dunbar to the water of Calne (page 258); and the contemporary account of Ettrick Forest has also allusions to the King being in the Forest with the host, and the host being in England (pages 226, 227).

The Galloway accounts of 1456 and 1457 contain two indications of intercourse of some kind existing between Scotland and the Isle of Man. There is first a disbursement of 36s. for provisions for a vessel (cujusdam batelle) sent to that island to explore at the time when the King's host was there,[1] and afterwards £5 paid by way of indemnification to Patrick Callander for the wreck of his ship at the Isle of Man in the King's service.[2] More than a century had elapsed since the final expulsion of the Scots from Man, and only thirty since the promulgation of a Manx statute commanding all Scots to leave the island by the next ship, under pain of forfeiture of goods and imprisonment.[3]

The accounts show us James engaged in field sports at Loch Fruchy and Holywell, from 26th September to 1st October 1456, the provision for his entertainment costing £28, 11s. 1d., besides eight marts.[4] On 9th of October he is again in Edinburgh, writing to Charles VII. a letter regarding his misunderstandings with the Dauphin,[5] and in a further letter to the French King, dated 13th October, he complains of the delay which has occurred in the return of certain ambassadors who had been sent by him to France to remonstrate regarding English aggressions; and as these aggressions still continue, he sends a second embassy, consisting of Patrick Young, Archdeacon of Galloway and Dean of Dunkeld, and Lyon King of Arms, to enforce his request for united action against the common enemy.[1]

A week later (19th October) a Council General was held at Edinburgh, where the topics of legislalation included a general arming of the whole population, weapon-schawings, and the making carts of war with two guns in each by the barons.[2] The Estates also made a further request to James for aid against the English, who, it was said, was still harassing the borders with incessant invasions.[3]

It was probably also by a provision of this Parliament that a tax was raised from the burghs and a loan from the burgesses to provide for the national defence, and to pay the expenses of the embassy sent

[1] Stevenson's Letters and Papers, &c., i. p. 328. Payments to all these three envoys, and to the master of the ship which conveyed them, occur in the Tax account, page 308.

[2] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 45.

[3] Stevenson's Letters, ut supra, i. p. 330. Notwithstanding the representations sent to France, some of the Acts of Parliament seem to indicate that the English invasions were abating. The borders, it is there said, do not require the same supplies as last year, being better provided, while the English are worse supplied than formerly. They are certain of peace on two of the three borders till Candlemas, and on the remaining border probably till "Wedderdays." The English, it is rather asserted, has suffered greater losses last summer than the Scottish borderers.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 45.

to France. One naturally supposes that the barons and clergy, or the barons at least, must have contributed their share to this impost, but no record has been preserved of such having been the case. All we know of this tax and loan is derived from an interesting account of them, chiefly in Flemish money (computed as exactly three times the value of the money of Scotland), rendered by Andrew Crawford on 25th July 1457, and said to embrace the period from 1st February 1456–7 to that date.[1]

Crawford, one of the most considerable burgesses of Edinburgh, was sent to Flanders to raise money there on the security of the Scottish burghs for the tax; and on the security of individual merchants for the loan, and to expend it for the purposes of the impost. The auditors allow him £10 for his travelling and other expenses, and his detention in Flanders from Christmas 1456 to 3d April 1457.[2]

We find the contributions from the burghs of Edinburgh, Dundee, Inverkeithing, Peebles, Forfar, Dunbar, and Aberdeen, together amounting to £100, 18s. Flemish, and the loans from nearly a hundred burgesses, mostly of Edinburgh, to £92, 16s. 8d. Flemish; while Crawford also debits himself with sums amounting to £98, 7s. 6d. Scots money, received from the burghs of Edinburgh, Perth, Dunfermline, Montrose, Arbroath, and Kirkcudbright. The compulsory character of the impost is shown by goods in Flanders belonging to the burghs of Aberdeen, Dundee, Cupar, and Perth, being attached for payment of it.

Out of these sums we find Crawford paying 52s. (Flemish) to the master of the vessel which brought the ambassadors, with £24 to Young, and £16 to Lyon King of Arms, and £10 to John Kennedy Archdeacon of St. Andrews, who—sent, as has been seen, on a separate mission to reconcile the French King and the Dauphin—had sailed in company with the other two envoys.[1] 20s. are paid to a banker for exchanging the Flemish money of the ambassadors into French crowns. There is a payment of £8 to one Master James, physician, to get back from him certain letters granted under the Great Seal—presumably certain fees on a grant which had been recalled; also £20 for medicines (certis materialibus ad ypothecariam spectantibus) contained in a large chest, which had been selected by one John of Sluys (de Sclusa) with the help of the King's merchant, and delivered to another physician, Master David Crannoch. £3, 12s. 10d. were paid for Rhine wine. The remainder of the expenditure, amounting to £126, 4s. 0½d. Flemish, or £378, 12s. 1½d. Scots, is on materials of war, which are all described as delivered to John Dunbar, already mentioned in connection with the surrender of Threave, who had been invested with some sort of superintendence of the military stores of the kingdom. These included 8000 lbs. of iron, 988 lbs. of salt-petre, 1600 lbs. of sulphur, and two barrels of charcoal for gunpowder, two Hamburg barrels of tried gunpowder (pulveris bombardorum de experiencia), 100 lbs. of cord for projectile engines, a great cable, a thinner cable, and some smaller ropes, 300 ells of canvas for pavillions and tents, and 1500 arrows and arrow-heads.[1]

The embassy to Charles VII., of which mention has been made, was unsuccessful in its main object. The French King, for reasons expressed in a manifesto of date January 1456–7, declined either to co-operate with James by invading England, or to furnish him with money or artillery.[2] The temporary re-establishment of the authority of Henry VI. soon after led to a wish on both sides for friendly intercourse between North and South Britain ; and while the proceedings of the Parliament of March 1457–8 are wound up by a devout expression of gratitude for the internal tranquillity of the country ;[3] a truce was, on 6th July 1457, concluded between England and Scotland to last till 6th July 1459 by land, and 28th July 1459 by sea.[4]

It may have been these negotiations that caused the King to postpone an intended journey (ad partes boreales) towards the close of 1456, for which great preparations had been made at Aberdeen.[5] But James certainly paid a visit to Aberdeen in May 1457, on the occasion of the reduction of the service of Lord Erskine—to be alluded to below—to which a payment in the Aberdeen customs' account and the mention of a forty days' visit in the Mar account of that year evidently allude.[1]

In the course of 1457 we also find James present at a justice ayre at Ayr, lodging in the house of Margaret Mure,[2] and visiting the Dominican Monastery at Perth, which, since his father's assassination, had ceased to be a resort of royalty. There is a suggestive entry about the cleaning of ditches, building of walls, fee of a mason, and four locks for the doors of this religious house, all in view of this visit, and at the King's expense; but the Prior, it is said, is to be responsible for the locks and keys.[3] Mention occurs about the same time of visits to Rothesay Castle and Dunoon.[4] But a large portion of the King's time in 1457 and 1458 seems to have been spent north of the Spey. Inverness, Elgin, Spyny Castle, the seat of the Bishop of Moray (his father's trusted friend John Wincester), and the monastery of Kinloss, were his frequent resorts.[5] He is mentioned as at justice ayres at Inverness and Elgin.[6] He caused extensive repairs to be carried on at, and additions to be made to, Inverness Castle, under the direction of the Bishop of Moray as master of works, and Alexander Fleming, a burgess of Perth.[7] He took up his residence for a time at the manse of Duffus, in the college of Elgin, to which he added a new kitchen; but during the absence abroad of the rector, Master David Stewart, the manse took fire, and was burned down, along with the furniture and the provisions for the royal household.[1] The famous hall of Darnaway Castle, traditionally ascribed to Thomas Randolph, was in reality begun by Archibald Douglas, the forfeited Earl of Moray; but, by the King's desire, the building was allowed to go on in the same style of grandeur and solidity which Douglas had contemplated; and the progress of the works is described in considerable detail in the Accounts of the Chamberlain beyond Spey for 1456, 1457, and 1458.[2] The custody of the castle was conferred first on Thomas Ogilvy of Balfour, Sheriff of Elgin, and afterwards on Alexander Dunbar of Westfield, son of the last Dunbar Earl of Moray. The famous island fortress of Lochindorb was, on the other hand, doomed to demolition. A warrant for its destruction had been granted to the Thane of Cawdor in March 1455–6,[3] and the accounts of 1458 attest that it was thrown down by him at a cost of £24.[4]

Ross and Lord of the Isles, whose possessions bordered with Moray on the north, was evidently considered a matter of moment. We have already found James so far passing from his right of ward as to allow him entry to some of his lands at the age of sixteen,[1] and, in respect of his youth and other considerations, condoning his seizure of the castles of Inverness, Urquhart, and Ruthven in March 1451–2.[2] But, during the period of the present volume, we find the Earl of Ross invested with a liferent right to Urquhart and Glenmoriston, and keeper of the important fortress of Urquhart;[3] and so long as James II. lived, he remained to all appearance a loyal and well-affected subject of the Crown. Boons are expressly stated to be granted in deference to the wishes of his Countess, the daughter of Lord Livingstone the Chamberlain.[4] His half-brother Celestine, otherwise called Gillespic of the Isles (ancestor of the Macdonalds of Lochalsh), also shared in the royal favour, being in 1456 presented with a silver collar and chain worth £20,[5] and soon afterwards holding the post of keeper of the castle of Eddirdule (otherwise Redcastle), with a nominal fee of £26, 13s. 4d., but really the whole revenues of Eddirdule in money, barley, oatmeal, marts, and sheep, with other lands outside that lordship.[6]

Frequent mention also occurs of the King's relations with a close ally of the Earl of Ross, Malcolm Mackintosh, otherwise called Callam Beg, whose son Duncan was the first of the family known under the designation of "captain of the Clan Chattan," a position which the influence of the Lord of the Isles seems to have acquired for him.[1] Malcolm M'Kyntoschey, senior, and Malcolm M'Kyntoschey, son, as well as Sir Bean (a churchman), Angus, and Alan, are found in occupation free of rent of portions of Petty and Brachly and of Strathnairn.[2] We also find a fine of £40 inflicted at the justice ayre against Mackintosh and his people, commuted into a payment of 60 marks for the royal table and a horse.[3]

II.

The return early in the year 1458 of two of the King's sisters from France leads us to go back to a matter which had for a considerable time been the subject of frequent diplomatic communication between Scotland and France, namely, the marriages of the ladies of the Scottish royal house.

In a letter from James II. to Charles VII., dated 21st November 1455,[4] James's thanks are tendered to the French King for his kindness to his sister the Duchess of Bretagne, but more especially for what he has done for the Lady Annabella in Savoy; and instructions connected with the affairs of these ladies are said to have been given to the Bishop of Galloway and other ambassadors about to proceed to France—a mission which has been already adverted to as regards its other object, the obtaining of supplies for an invasion of England. Regarding these two ladies a few explanations may be desirable.

Elizabeth or Isabel Duchess of Bretagne, second daughter of James I., had become a widow in 1450; and her brother-in-law Duke Peter had succeeded to the duchy to the exclusion of her children, who were daughters. Evidence exists of a marriage having been contemplated between the widowed Duchess and the Prince of Navarre (Charles, Prince Viana, son of Bianca Queen of Navarre by John II. of Arragon); and Lobineau[1] asserts that the chief object of several embassies, on which the Bishop of Galloway was sent from Scotland to France and Bretagne, was to prevent the Duchess from entering into this or any other second marriage. The letters and official documents which have been preserved in the French archives show that James II. called in question the exclusion of his elder niece from the inheritance of Bretagne, and, on the plea that the jointure to which his sister was entitled was withheld from her, and that she was kept in a sort of durance by her brother-in-law, protested against any marriage which might be arranged for her as long as she was in Bretagne and not a free agent. Further, the same sources of information show, that at a conference between the Duchess Dowager and certain ambassadors of Charles VII. sent to enforce the views of the King of Scots, the Duchess denied that her brother-in-law had acted otherwise than fairly by her, and complained that her late husband had never received the dower to which he was entitled from Scotland. Eventually, through the intervention of the French King, matters were settled by the breaking off of the intended match, the full recognition of the right of the heir-male to the duchy, the marriage of the Duchess's elder daughter—then a child—to her cousin, afterwards Duke Francis II. of Bretagne, and the betrothal of the younger daughter to the Vicomte de Rohan, events which took place in 1455.

The Lady Annabella, youngest daughter of James I., had been contracted in marriage to Louis, Count of Geneva, in 1444, both being children;[1] and in 1455 she was conducted to Savoy in view of the marriage taking place. The allusion to the good offices of the King of France in behalf of the lady seems to have preceded the formal breaking off of her marriage, which took place at Gannat in Bourbonnois, in presence of the King of France and Bishop of Galloway. Guichenon[2] alleges that it was the influence of the French King "a qui le duc Louis déférait tout" that broke the marriage off. The damage paid by the Duke of Savoy for the breach of contract and expenses of the return journey was 25,000 crowns. "In this way," says Mr. Riddell,[1] "James consents to the return of his sister to Scotland, on condition of a kind of damages being paid for the disappointment of her prospects and the expenses she had incurred; after which he is willing, overlooking an affront which he indeed could not avenge, to receive her to his fraternal arms." But is it not possible that, quiet being restored by the suppression of the Douglas power, James would rather have his sisters married in Scotland than abroad, and that there was a perfect understanding betwixt him and the French King on the subject?

Another sister of the King of Scots was in France about 1456,—the deaf and dumb Joanna, third daughter of James I. That she had remained continuously in France since she went abroad with her sister Eleanor in the summer or autumn of 1445, rests perhaps on no positive evidence; but there seems to be no foundation for the statement first made—so far as the editor is aware—by Hume of Godscroft, that she married James Earl of Angus; nor does it seem likely that she was even betrothed to him. The Earl of Angus was dead before the audit of 1447.[1] In 1456 it was contemplated that she, as well as her youngest sister, whose marriage had been broken off, should be brought back to Scotland. The arrangements regarding their return were entrusted to Thomas Spens, Bishop of Galloway, who wrote from Aigueperse near Clermont on March 21, 1456–7, that he had transferred the Lady Joanna to the care of Sir William Monypenny to convey her to Scotland:[2] and it was probably in expectation of meeting her that the King and Court are found sojourning for some time prior to July 1457 at the intended port of landing, Kirkcudbright.[3] But the homeward voyage had been deferred till too late a period of the year; and the Bishop of Galloway wrote again from Harfleur, on 8th November 1457, to announce that the Ladies Joanna and Annabella had been conveyed by Monypenny to that port to embark for Scotland; but after they had proceeded a short way out to sea, the largest ship and a balinger had their masts cut away from stress of weather, and were in danger of being lost. The result was that the ladies returned on shore; and in the opinion of competent persons their proceeding on their voyage at that stormy season would have been unsafe. Monypenny, it was added, had been despatched to Scotland to explain the cause of the detention.[4]

The Ladies Joanna and Annabella landed at the port of Kirkcudbright in the spring of 1458. The custumars of that burgh, in their account rendered 11th July 1458, are allowed £24, 7s. for wine, marts, salmon, and salt, furnished by mandate of the Bishop of Galloway to the mariners of the great ship Roman, in which the King's sisters came from France to Kirkcudbright;[1] and in the following year the Chamberlain of Galloway is allowed £10 for wine furnished on the same mandate to the sailors bringing the King's sisters to these parts.[2] In the accounts of 1460 we find 12 marts and 2 chalders of oatmeal delivered to a Breton, master of the ship that brought Sir William Monypenny from Bretagne to Scotland.[3]

Both ladies were soon afterwards married. In anticipation of the marriage of Joanna, which had probably been arranged before her return, a new Earldom—that of Morton—was bestowed on her prospective husband, James Douglas, third Lord Dalkeith.[4]

[4] A peculiarity in the constitution of this Earldom deserves notice. Lord Dalkeith was de facto in possession of the regality of Morton in Nithsdale when it was proposed to erect it, along with his other lands, into an Earldom of Morton. But a difficulty arose in connection with the state of the investitures. Morton had been originally acquired by the great-grandfather of the intended Earl, Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, from his brother-in-law George, Earl of March, by a charter confirmed by David II. in 1370 (Registrum Honoris de Morton, pp. 77, 79). The son of the first and father of the third Lord Dalkeith had, in his father's lifetime, and when his family were in childhood, become insane; and his younger brothers

George, Lord Gordon, second son, but heir by special designation, of the Earl of Huntly was the destined bridegroom of the Lady Annabella. The exact date of her marriage is unknown, but she appears as his wife in a charter of date 11th March 1459–60.[1] Their marriage was dissolved by divorce and his stepmother seem to have availed themself of this circumstance to acquire rights prejudicial to their nephew, the future representative of the family. When the first Lord Dalkeith, shortly before his death, obtained a new charter of the barony of Morton as a regality, he was induced to have the investitures taken to himself and his wife Janet Borthwick, with remainder to her son William (Reg. Mag. Sig., iii. 135, 28th February 1439–40). This lady had in her widowhood succeeded in obtaining two Crown confirmations of this investiture (on 7th March 1449–50 and 22nd March 1450–51, Reg. Mag. Sig., iv. 6 and 192), and was indisposed to acquiesce in the legal sanction proposed to be given to what she would consider as the usurpation by her step-grandson of her twice ratified rights. Accordingly, on 14th March 1457–8, when the King's intention of creating this new Earldom was announced in Parliament, her brother, Lord Borthwick, in her name, raised the objection that she and her son, and not Lord Dalkeith, had the true legal right to Morton. The Chancellor's reply was that Lord Dalkeith was not to receive his title in the Earldom (non intitulari debere in dicto comitatu) for Morton in Nithsdale, but for Morton in Caldercleir (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 78); an evasive answer, yet one which Lord Hailes rightly represents as irreconcilable with the idea of titles of Earldom being considered personal and not territorial at that period (Additional Sutherland Case, c. iv. p. 55). The charter constituting the original investiture of the Earldom is wanting; and there being unfortunately a hiatus at this date both in Register of the Great Seal and in the "Registrum Honoris de Morton," its phraseology is unknown to us. On 9th October 1459 Lady Dalkeith again appeared in Parliament, complaining that she was excluded from possession of Morton, and praying to be restored to it; and her prayer was granted (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 79). The "Registrum Honoris de Morton" informs us (ii. p. 219) that on 12th January 1473–4, Sir William Douglas of Whittinghame, son of Janet Borthwick, formally resigned his right to Morton in favour of his nephew the Earl. Soon afterwards (27th May 1474), as will be seen below, some sort of right to Dalkeith which had been acquired during the period of curatory by Henry Douglas, another uncle of the Earl, was similarly resigned by Henry's son Hugh Douglas of Borg. on 24th July 1471, on the ground of relationship within the third and fourth degrees of affinity.[1]

Monypenny was soon afterwards employed, in conjunction with John Kennedy provost of St. Andrews, and others, in missions to the King of France, to ask protection of the county of Saintonge, which had been granted to James I. in consideration of the marriage of his eldest daughter to the Dauphin; to Spain to arrange a treaty with Castile; to Rome to do homage to the newly appointed Pope, Pius II. (who as Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini had visited the Court of James I. and written an interesting account of his embassy); and to the Court of Christiern of Norway, regarding a proposal to submit to their mutual ally Charles VII. an unsettled question regarding the debt due by Scotland for the Western Islands and the Isle of Man.[2] In the Galloway account of 1459, £40 are allowed to

Monypenny for his expenses in getting ready the ship in which he sailed for France.[1]

According to Law's manuscript, an interruption to the general tranquillity occurred in Annandale in October 1458. The passage—probably an incorrect transcription from some earlier chronicle, seems to imply that on the 23rd of that month there was an unsuccessful invasion of the West March in the interest of the Douglases, in which 600 English were slain, and 1500 captured.[2] This raid may possibly be the foundation for Boece's story of an expedition by the Earl of Northumberland and attainted Earl of Douglas into Scotland, who, after a severe engagement, were routed by the Earl of Angus, an occurrence which that writer has made to precede James's expedition into Northumberland. If the invasion in question really took place, it must have been unsanctioned by the government of Henry VI., with whom James continued on terms of friendship.

Visits of the King to Ruthven in Badenach and Kinloss, and to Aberdeen, are mentioned in the accounts of 1459, and to Ross in those of 1460;[3] and both tell of an intended but unaccomplished journey to the north, for which extensive preparations had been made.[4]

In the customs' account of Edinburgh for the year ending July 1459, £5 are allowed to a courier bringing leters from the King of England regarding Margaret Douglas, wife of James formerly Earl of Douglas, traitor.[1] The "Fair Maid of Galloway" is said to have placed herself under the protection of James, on the plea that she had been coerced into her marriages both with Earl William and Earl James. The King of England's letter secured her a kindly reception at the Scottish court; and, though her right to Galloway was not recognised by the Crown, her union with Douglas was in some unexplained way dissolved, and she within less than a year became wife of John Stewart, Earl of Athole, half-brother of the King. The account of the Chamberlain of Galloway in the following year contains a payment of £66, 13s. 4d. on the King's mandate, to Margaret, daughter of Archibald Earl of Douglas, now wife of the Earl of Athole, which, it is added, is not to be continued, in respect that provision has otherwise been made for Margaret by the King.[2]

In the course of 1459 various embassies passed between England and Scotland to treat of prolongations of the truce, and arrange regarding past infringements of it, the safe-conduct in one case alluding to certain secret matters already spoken of to the King by the Abbot of Melrose ;[1] and in February 1459–60, the truce, which had latterly been prolonged only for terms of two years, was extended for a period of seven years, namely, to 6th July 1468 by land, and 28th July 1468 by sea.[2] Garter King of Arms, the accounts tell us, was six days with his servants in the house of William Carribris in Edinburgh ;[3] and there is an allowance for the expenses of an English pursuivant at Edinburgh and Stirling.[4] Rothesay herald got £24 and twelve English nobles for expediting the King's affairs in England,[5] these affairs being explained to have reference to the recovery of goods of Scots merchants taken at sea by the English.[6] There had also, it appears, been reprisals in the shape of English ships brought as prizes by the French to the Scottish ports ;[7] and 40s. are allowed to Marchmont herald, sent to have a meeting with the Earl of Northumberland, about the safety of ships and merchants.[8] As late as June 2nd 1460, the Bishops of Glasgow and Aberdeen, the Abbots of Holyrood, Melrose, and Dunfermline, Livingston the Chamberlain, Lords Avondale, Montgomery, and others, had a safe-conduct to meet the English commissioners regarding the alleged infringements of the truce at York, Durham, and Newcastle.[1]

At the same time the accounts of 1458 and 1459 indicate that, notwithstanding the peace at home and abroad, the defence of the country was not neglected. The King's attention to the artillery is shown by frequent entries of expenditure connected with bombards (two of which were sent by the Duke of Burgundy), and for iron, arrows, lances, a tent for the King, &c.[2]

An entire change soon afterwards came over the relations between the two countries. On 10th July 1460 the Lancastrians suffered a severe defeat at Northampton; the English King was taken prisoner, and the Queen and Prince were on their way to take shipping for Scotland. The truce had been made with Henry of Lancaster; and James no longer held it binding when King Henry was in the hands of his enemies. The recent military preparations enabled him to bring a numerous and well-appointed army into the field in a very short space of time, with which he laid siege to the border castle of Roxburgh. If it be true, as one would gather from Bishop Lesley,[1] that the secret matter, regarding which the English ambassadors were appointed to treat with the Abbot of Melrose on 26th July 1459, was a stipulation for the surrender of a portion of territory, including the formerly Scottish towns of Berwick and Roxburgh, in return for aid to be given to Henry against the house of York, a special reason existed for James's attack on Roxburgh Castle, in which he is said to have been aided by the Earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles, with a large body of his vassals. On Sunday 3rd August, standing near a bombard which was being fired, the piece exploded, and the King was struck with one of the wedges of timber used to tighten the iron hoops which encircled it, —or, according to other authorities, with a splinter of metal. The blow caused almost instant death, the explosion at the same time wounding the Earl of Angus, who stood near the King.

Forfeitures greatly extended the possessions of the King in the reign of James I., and still more so in that of his successor. The accounts of the officers who had charge of the Crown lands become so prominent in the present volume as to make it desirable at this point to enter into a few explanations more detailed than heretofore, about the nature of the rolls of the "Ballivi ad extra," and their relation to the accounts of the Sheriffs. So few accounts of the Sheriffs have been preserved that a higher value attaches to the two extant Sheriffs' rolls of this reign, those of 1456 and 1457.

Generally speaking, the items on the charge side of the Sheriffs' accounts consist of the regularly recurring reddendos of lands held by feudal tenures from the Crown, wards and other casualties, castle wards, and the issues of the justice ayres and sheriff courts. But the fermes of lands in the occupation of the Crown seldom occur, because these, if of any extent, were usually placed in charge of a separate officer, in whose account and not that of the Sheriff their revenues appeared. At the same time the jurisdiction of sheriff and bailie were to a certain extent coordinate; and there are some classes of entries which may be looked for in the accounts of either.[1]

[1] We have in the audits of 1455 and 1456 the accounts of twenty-one Sheriffdoms, viz., Aberdeen, whose Sheriff was David Earl of Crawford; Argyll, Colin Lord Campbell; Ayr, Sir George Campbell of Loudoun; Banff, Sir Walter Ogilvy of Deskford; Berwick, Patrick Lord Hailes; Clackmannan, Sir William Menteith of Carse; Dumbarton, John Colquhoun of Luss; Dumfries, Robert Crichton of Sanquhar; Edinburgh, Sir Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie (who had succeeded James Lord Crichton); Fife, Andrew Lundy; Forfar, Alexander Ogilvy of Auchterhouse; Kincardine, William Lord Keith; Kinross, James Schaw; Lanark, James Lord Hamilton (who had succeeded James Earl of Douglas); Linlithgow, Archibald Dundas of Dundas; Peebles, Sir David Hay of Lochorwart; Perth, William Moray of Tullibardine; Renfrew, Sir Robert Sempil of Eliotstoun; Roxburgh, Sir Archibald Douglas of Cavers; Stirling, James Livingstone; and

There is a regularly recurring class of returns in the Sheriffs' accounts, known under the generic name of "redditus assise." Under this designation are included the yearly duties payable by vassals of the Crown for lands held by them, whether in ward, blench, or feu; those duties are so called, as being one of the matters determined by the assize under the brieve of succession, the retour of which established the right of the Crown vassal to his lands.

It is a mistake to suppose that annual payments were never due in ward-holding. Various instances may be pointed out during the period comprised in this volume and before it, of lands held in ward, where, in addition to military service, a payment in money was stipulated for. Thus, a charter by William the Lion of Bingouer to Malcolm Earl of Fife,[1] contains the clause "Reddendo inde redditum quod ad terram illam pertinet scilicet quatuor celdras farrine avene et quatuor marcas . . . . et faciendo forinsecum servicium quod ad terram illam pertinet;" and in the only roll which has been preserved of Robert I., a charter of Hassindean to Sir James Cunningham has a reddendo of Wigtown, Andrew Agnew (who had succeeded James Earl of Douglas). There are no accounts of the Sheriffs of Inverness, Elgin, Forres, Nairn, Selkirk, or Bute; but the Chamberlain north of Dee or of Spey accounted for the King's revenues in the four first named sheriffdoms; the sheriffdom of Selkirk was identical with Ettrick Forrest; and the Chamberlain of Bute and Arran rendered the accounts of Bute. The constabulary of Haddington formed part of the sheriffdom of Edinburgh.

[1] In the General Register House; and printed in Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 390.

"undecim libras sterlingorum," and in addition, "forinsecum servicium dimidii militis."[1] Similarly, in the charter by Robert I. to Sir James Douglas of Lothian of Kincavil and Calderclere, there is in addition to "forinsecum servicium" an annualrent of £12, 5s. 10d.[2] The earldoms of Caithness and Sutherland were in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries burdened with money payments of this kind,[3] payments which, under the designation of "redditus assise," are enumerated in 1367 in a catalogue of Crown rights alienated since the death of Robert Bruce, which were thenceforth to be resumed.[4]

It is equally an error to suppose that feu-tenure from the Crown was unknown until the Statute of 1457 expressly legalised it. It seems to be implied in the account of the Sheriff of Cromarty in 1264,[5] and is expressly specified in that of the Sheriff of Lanark, c. 1290.[6] The tenure by which thanes held their lands was, as Mr. Skene has shown, identical with feu-holding, and there are various "redditus assise" in the Sheriffs' accounts rendered in 1358–9, which seem to imply feu rather than blench-holding,[7] though it must be kept in mind that blench duties were not always illusory. And in the Sheriffs' accounts of the present volume, including those of 1456, the year before the Statute alluded to, there is express mention of feu-tenure.[1] Feu-holding, however, became much more general after the Statute of 1457, which enjoined that the King should show the example to the prelates, barons, and freeholders, by feuing the Crown lands.[2]

[7] In the accounts of the Sheriff of Aberdeen in these years (vol. i. pages 545 and 551), the references to Aboyne, a thanage, and Straloch, not a thanage, both imply feu-holding; and in the contemporary accounts of the Sheriffs of Perth and Fife (vol. i. pages 553, 560), the "redditus assise" seem to a considerable extent to be feu-holdings.

In addition to the commoner blench duties, such as gilt or white spurs, broad arrows or arrow-heads, a red rose, a red sparrowhawk, a pound of pepper or of cummin—there occur among the "redditus assise" a few of a more unusual kind, a gold necklace from Blantyre,[3] one hundred and fifty iron nails for the King's vat from Smethylhalch in Aberdeenshire,[4] a crossbow (arcus cum circulo) for the park of Stirling,[5] a pair of white gloves "pro falconibus bavilandis," from the fairs of Dundee for the Castlehill of that town,[6] and a waggon load of hay "liberando in castro de Strivelyne pro latrinis ejusdem," for the croft of Fethirale.[7]

[1] In the account of the Sheriff of Kinross, Burley and Tulery are said to have been granted by the King "per cartam infeodacionis" to Michael of Balfour (page 141). The reddendo of Pultirland is, in the same account of the Sheriff of Edinburgh, called first "redditus assise" and afterwards "feodofirma" (pages 142, 144). On page 150, is mentioned the "feodofirma" of Dusclune; on page 156 of Tullyhaky; and there are other references to feu-holding as an existing tenure in the accounts of the earldoms of Mar and Fife.

The wards, reliefs, marriages, non-entries, and escheats often contain matter valuable to the genealogist. Occasionally lands in ward to the Crown are considered of sufficient importance to have their fermes accounted for by a local ballivus.

Castle wards are a class of payments regarding which we possess little information besides what is in the Exchequer rolls. They were---in their origin at least—dues paid by lands in the vicinity of some of the King's castles for keeping them in repair. They occur from time to time in the accounts of the Chamberlain, and afterwards appear in those of the Sheriffs of Lanark, Roxburgh, and Edinburgh, and of the bailie of the earldom of March, the castles for whose maintenance they were imposed being Edinburgh, Lanark, Dumfries, Roxburgh, Stirling, Linlithgow, and Berwick. The most prominent castle wards in the accounts of the reign of James II. are those of the earldom of March, avowedly exacted for the maintenance of the castle of Berwick-on-Tweed;[1] it may therefore be inferred that castle wards had come practically to be a payment due to the Crown for certain lands, not appropriated to any special purpose. The Minorite Friars of Dundee and of Haddington had annuities of ten and twenty marks respectively from the castle wards of Edinburgh.[2]

There is a diversity in the designations of the officers who return the accounts of the Crown lands. Some are simply "ballivi" or chamberlains of the particular lands; others are designed coroners, mairs of fee, or serjeants of the lands whose rents they account for. It is not easy to define the difference between the offices of coroner, mair, and serjeant. It was one of the duties of all three to summon persons before the justice ayre and other tribunals; but the coroner seems to have been a higher officer than the mair or serjeant,[1] and his duties were in some cases hereditary. John Hatelee is called serjeant or mair of Strathurd;[2] but while mair and serjeant were often convertible terms, it might be rash to say they were always so.

The Crown lands, like the lands of the Crown vassals, were to a large extent in the hands of "firmarii," who held portions of land for payment in money and produce, either under leases which were renewed from time to time, or as kindly tenants or rentallers, with a certain fixity of tenure. These Crown tenants, though varying in social position, and not to be identified with "bondi," are in the accounts often collectively called "husbandi." In some, though not all cases, the rent in produce as well as money appears on the charge side of the accounts; in a few the expenditure of the produce is given, but there is frequent reference to rentals and other books now lost; the rolls of the "ballivi" do not therefore give us a complete account of the rent of the Crown lands, and still less of its expenditure. There was a usage in many places of a certain number of marts being exigible for the royal table—these marts being known under the various designations of stukmarts, rinmarts, lardenare-marts, fodemarts, and martfodalis, and the tenants were paid for them in money at a fixed rate greatly below the market price. Sheep (rynmuttons) were sometimes paid on a similar footing. The entries on the discharge side of the accounts show that a practice prevailed very largely of allowing tenants to occupy their holdings rent-free, either in respect of some office of which the rent was considered the fee, or in reward for some signal service done; also that tenandries so occupied were from time to time converted into feudal holdings, the occupiers getting charters, and thus becoming Crown vassals instead of tenants. Demesne lands or "mains" (terre dominicales) are occasionally mentioned, lands retained by the King in his own hands, and cultivated by his agricultural labourers or "bondi;" and we find lands which have long been so occupied, continuing to retain the name of "terre dominicales" when in the hands of tenants. There are here and there details of considerable interest connected with the granges or corn farms of the King.

[2] The "toschaderach"—a word considered equivalent to coroner—of Mar (vol. v. pages 601, 658) is obviously a higher officer than the mairs of the different districts of Mar.

IV.

It is now proposed to advert separately to each of the series of accounts contained in the rolls of Ballivi ad Extra in this and the preceding volume, premising that these accounts include the lands of the Prince, as also those on which the Queen's dowry was secured.

Lands around Edinburgh.—When Edinburgh Castle was first a royal residence, the King's demesnes surrounding it were of considerable extent. Part of them became the royal burgh of Edinburgh; and other portions, as King's Cramond, were alienated before the time of Robert Bruce. In the reign of James I., and the early part of that of James II., there was a receiver of Crown rents south of the Forth, Thomas Cranstoun, who was also constable of Edinburgh Castle, warden of the mint, and a custumar of Edinburgh, and of whom we have two accounts. In his account of 1434,[1] the entries on the debtor side are mostly receipts from lands in ward,[2] but there are a few subjects expressly said to be the King's property, namely, Ballincrieff and Gosford in the parish of Aberlady, Merchamstoun (Merchiston) in the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh, whose fermes were £17, 6s. 8d.; and [1] Vol. iv. page 597.

[2] The lands in ward included, during the minority of George Lord Seton, Tranent and its colliery, one of the earliest worked collieries in Scotland, of which there is an interesting separate account (vol. v. page 52). Its revenues were £388, 12s. 6½d. in the year ending Whitsunday 1437; and £333, 14s. 7d. in that ending Whitsunday 1438.

Murehouse,[1] where fermes were £2, 13s. 4d. Cranstoun's next account, rendered in 1438, includes Ballincrieff and Gosford, but not Merchiston, which had been pledged to, and eventually became the property of, Alexander Naper (son apparently of Alexander Naper, Dean of Guild of Edinburgh in 1403), whose defence of the Queen-mother in 1439 was, when James II. came to mature years, requited by a charter of Philde in Perthshire, and the office of Comptroller. He was provost of Edinburgh in 1454.[2] In the Comptroller's account of 1449 we have the fermes of Ballincrieff and Gosfurd. In 1450 Murehouse is alienated to Stephen Scot.[3]

The accounts of Thomas Tempilman of Crown receipts from the sheriffdom of Edinburgh in 1453 and 1454,[4] relate chiefly or wholly to lands in ward, Ballincreiff and Gosford having passed temporarily into the occupation of James Kennedy,

[1] Robert Bruce is said, in Wood's Ancient and Modern State of Cramond, p. 24, to have granted a charter of Murehouse to Sir William Oliphant in exchange for a piece of land within the park of Kincardine in Mearns, taken by John Balliol, c. 1316. It has been presumed that it remained with the Oliphants: but the rolls show that it was royal demesne in 1434 and 1438.

[2] See Charters and Documents relating to the City of Edinburgh 1143–1540 (Burgh Records' Society); pp. 74–96. The following allusions to the acquisition of Merchiston by the Napiers occur in the Exchequer Rolls. In 1436, a balance of £44, 6s. 6d. due by Archdeacon Foulis of St. Andrews, keeper of the Privy Seal to James I. is set off against a larger sum lent by Foulis to redeem Merchamstoun from Alexander Naper (vol. iv. page 607). Merchamstoun is said in 1438 to be wadsetted (impignorata per modum vendicionis) to Alexander Naper, burgess of Edinburgh, the King's letter of reversion being in the hands of Sir William Crichton in Edinburgh Castle (vol. v. page 63).

Bishop of St. Andrews.[1] These possessions, as well as Edinburgh Castle, are included in the lands inalienably annexed to the Crown in 1455; and from 1457 onwards there are regular accounts of these fermes, those of Ballincreiff being £62, 2s. 8d., with ten chalders of wheat; and of Gosford, £16.[2]

Lands around Linlithgow.—The fermes of the royal possessions immediately around Linlithgow Palace, and elsewhere within the sheriffdom or constabulary of Linlithgow, were rendered by the serjeant or mair of these lands, who was also keeper of Linlithgow Palace—John Clerkson, afterwards Nicholas Henrison. Among lands enumerated are the King's acres east and west of the palace, an annualrent from the so-called Fiddler's-croft and Orchardcroft (otherwise called Lambertsyard), Kingisfeld, Locheid, Kincavil, Drumcorse, Bonnytoun, certain subjects in the barony of Houston, and the Wra, which Sir George Crichton of Cairnes had acquired by marriage and the King had obtained by an excambion with him.[3] The whole fermes of these subjects amounted in 1457 to £140, 17s. 8d., with one chalder barley, one chalder oats, two dozen hens, and two dozen capons.[4]

While there is no longer the same heavy outlay on the buildings of Linlithgow as in the previous reign, indications are not wanting that the palace park, loch, and fish-ponds were cared for; and that the loch continued to yield its quota of pike, perch, and eels for the royal consumption.[1]

Lands near Stirling.—The annexations in the Act of 1455 include the castle of Stirling and the King's lands lying about it; and these were in the reign of James II. very considerable. They are accounted for by John Darrach, elsewhere designed King's steward and King's butcher, and a bailie of Stirling. In Darrach's account of 1455, the gross rent of the Crown possessions in Stirlingshire, exclusive of grain, amounted to £184, 19s., with two dozen salmon from the cruives of Bothkennar.[2]

The Exchequer accounts of 1329 indicate that Skeoch, Cragorth (Craigforth), Auchinbothy, the two Tulchs, and Raploch, were all "terre firmate" of the Crown;[3] while those of 1359 show that Skeoch, Cragorth, and Auchinbothy had been granted to Reginald More the Chamberlain, or his son, from whom the Crown received an annualrent or feu-duty (redditus assise) of 40 marks a year.[4] Skeoch again became Crown property, but from 1386 onwards an annualrent of 20 marks from Cragorth is a regularly recurring item in the receipts of the Duke of Albany as Chamberlain and Governor, till 1407, when Albany endowed with it one-half of a chaplainry in the chapel of St. Michael in Stirling Castle, for the souls of the Kings of Scotland and of his (Albany's) wives and descendants,[1] after which the annuity still recurs, but diminished to 10 marks.

The barony of Tillicoultry, in the sheriffdom of Clackmannan, whose fermes appear in Darrach's accounts, was the property, during the Albany regency, of the Regent's son John Earl of Buchan and his wife; and Albany's charter of it to them was confirmed by James I. soon after his return to Scotland;[2] there being a remainder in these charters to the heirs-male whatsoever of Robert Duke of Albany, under which it lapsed to the Crown on Duke Murdach's attainder.

Corntoun, in the first half of the fifteenth century, belonged to a branch of the Fraser family, and was occupied by the King, who paid a rent for it. But by an excambion of date 1455 it became Crown property, Fraser getting in exchange for it Muchal (afterwards called Castle Fraser), in Mar, and Stonywood, near Aberdeen.[3]

[1] Vol. iv. page 68. Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 231, No. 22.

[2] Reg. Mag. Sig., ii. 32, 25th Feb. 1425–6.

[3] Corntoun is mentioned in 1290 in an account of the Sheriff of Stirling (vol. i. page 39); but as we have that account only in an abridged form, it is difficult to say whether it was then the King's property or only occupied by the King. From 1428 to 1435, James I. paid annually £6, 13s. 4d. to James Skene of Skene for his occupation of terce lands of Corntoun belonging to Skene's wife, widow of a Fraser of Corntoun (vol. iv. pages 444, 483, 511, 538, 567, 616). From 1438 to 1450, Thomas Fraser of Corntoun got £20 yearly out of the King's fermes north of Dee, or the customs of Aberdeen, in compensation for the King's occupancy of Corntoun (vol. v. pages 55, 96, 134, 188, 234, 270, 306, 342, 389), and in 1451 and three following years, the Crown being now in possession of the earldom of Mar, the £20 are in whole or part paid out of the lands of Mukwale or Muchal (vol. v. pages 463, 516, 600, 656), In 1455 Fraser is heritably infeft in Earldom of Fife. — The extant accounts of James Patonson as receiver of fermes in money and grain of the earldom of Fife begin in 1451; but there is allusion in the first of them to a former account, now lost. That earldom had come into the possession of James I. by the attainder in 1425 of Murdach Duke of Albany, whose father had obtained it under an entail by Duncan Earl of Fife and indenture by Isabel, daughter of the latter. The receipts in these accounts are almost exclusively those of the lands let in ferme, the blench duties and casualties of the earldom being for the most part returned by the Sheriff of Fife.

The earldom comprised the greater portion of the sheriffdom of Fife, and was divided into the four quarters of Edyn, Largo, Auchtermuchty, and Falkland, over each of which was a serjeant or mair. There was a general reletting before Whitsunday 1456, and another in 1459,[1] and various rentals occur both in this volume and in its predecessor. In the accounts of 1457 and 1458 the gross rent is £560, 12s. 7½d. in money, 35 chalders, 3 bolls wheat; 62 chalders, 3 bolls barley; 46 chalders, 3 bolls oats, and 2 bolls oatmeal.[2] In 1451 the rental given includes also 471 capons, and 104 geese. In 1460 the money rent is a little higher, the grain rent lower, and the colliery of Largo pays 32 chalders of coals instead of £37 in money. A like quantity of coals is also paid from Newtoun of Markinch.[1] At the re-letting of 1459 grassums were exacted to the amount of £84, 3s. 4d.[2]

Muchal by way of excambion for Corntoun; and as the fermes of Muchal (deducting an annualrent in which Lord Forbes was infeft), amounted only to £18, 13s. 4d., he gets in addition, also by charter, the lands of Stanewod or Stonywood (vol. vi. page 68).

The disbursements on the discharge side are in money only. Many of them are connected with Falkland, which became a favourite resort of the court after the marriage of James II. There are constantly recurring entries connected with the household expenditure there,[3] including the keep and care of the King's and Queen's horses,[4] wages of grooms and other servants,[5] among whom are "verleti canum,"[6] brewing,[7] the repairing of buildings, roofing of halls and chambers, a new vat in the brewhouse, a kitchen, malthouse, larder, and counting house,[8] and payments to the boys of the chapel.[9] The gardener has 53s. 4d., and the park keeper £3 of yearly wages,[10] and one Marjory Baty is paid for making an enclosure for the ward and wood of Falkland.[11] In the course of a single year the King's and Queen's horses consumed £84 worth of oats.[12]

Around this royal residence there sprang up a town or village, and in the account of 1459, three years after the Statute recommending the feuing of of the Crown lands, we find the Comptroller coming for two nights to Falkland, "pro assedacione dicte ville ad feodofirmam, mensuracione et divisione ejusdem."[1] In the Great Seal Register, of date 13th July 1459, occur a series of twenty-two feu-charters in the (so-called) burgh of Falkland. The first of them, which alone is given unabbreviated, grants to John Bowman and his heirs the tenement in Falkland which he had before farmed, in free burgage, with a reddendo of 50s. annualrent and burghal ferme, binding him, however, "hospitare et receptare in hostilagio quotiens opus fuerit viginti quatuor equos et personas, et eis tam in esculentis, potulentis, et pabulis equorum, quam in aliis necsariis pro personis et equis ipsarum personarum, sumptibus et expensis, ipsis ministrare, ac terras pro premissis habendis infra terminum quinque annorum construere et edificare.[2] The other charters are generally described as similar, with the reddendo and number of horses and persons varying in each. Notwithstanding the use of the words "in libero burgagio," Falkland had no charter, nor was it in the proper sense a burgh; and the tenure of the vassals was, agreeably to the ordinary understanding, feu and not burgage. Accordingly, in the rental of 1460, £20 is given as the "feodofirma ville de Faucland."[3] of Menteith, which Robert Duke of Albany acquired by marriage, was, like that of Fife, forfeited in 1426 by his son's attainder. On 6th September 1427, James I. erected certain lands which had formed a part of that earldom, and in which the Loch of Menteith was included, into a new earldom bearing the same name, which he bestowed on Malise Graham, grandson of his uncle David Stewart, as some small compensation for having unjustly taken from him the earldom of Strathern. Other lands belonging to the old earldom of Menteith, James I. bestowed on his brother-in-law William Edmondstone of Culloden; but the larger portion he retained in his own hands. The rents of the annexed portion of the earldom of Menteith appear in an account of 1434, of which the beginning is wanting;[1] and from 1451 onwards we have a series of accounts of the chamberlain of the King's lands in the earldom of Menteith, lands situated partly in Perthshire partly in Stirlingshire, these accounts comprising also Strathgartney or the northern shore of Loch Katrine, which formed no part of the old earldom of Menteith, but had been acquired by King David II. from Sir Robert Erskine in exchange for Alloa. After 1456 the accounts of Menteith are combined with those of Strathern.

In some of the Menteith accounts the fermes in produce as well as in money appear. In 1451 the gross rental amounted to £351, 12s. 8d., 34 chal-

ders oats, 24 chalders 7 bolls oatmeal, 2 chalders 2 bolls barley, 34 muttons, 60 poultry, and 140 salmon.[1] Of this rent £60, 2s. 8d., and the barley and sheep, were from Strathgartney. In 1460 £38, 6s. and 24 marts were received by way of grassums.[2] In 1456 iron is alluded to as forming part of the rent of Strathgartney; and the laird of Buchanan is asserted to have been in the use of paying 20 vangis (wethis) of iron from Drummond and Duchray.[3] A French smith has, for his fee, permission to occupy a cottage of 20s. yearly value for life.[4]

The Castle of Doune had been the favourite residence of Robert and Murdach Dukes of Albany. It would appear from the Exchequer accounts of 1431 that James I. and his family occasionally sojourned there;[5] and the accounts of this and the preceding volume show that it was much resorted to by James II. In one year £34, 18s. 4d. was spent in the purchase of forty-four marts for the royal household at Doune, and 38s. 9d. were paid for swine, calves, and kids.[6] Next year there is an item of 18s. for bread, ale, capons, and poultry, used at Doune on 9th June 1454, and omitted to be entered in the household books;[7] and we have later a payment of £117, 8s. for the expenditure of the Prince at Doune, from 12th June to 24th December

The King when at Doune resorted for the chase to the adjacent forest of Glenfinlas. The description of game is nowhere specified; red deer may be thought most probable. In 1454 the rents of Doune, Dowy, Hagerston, Glenfinlas, Easter and Wester Dowe, Stronewnef, Mergyngerach, and Glenmane, in all £11, 13s. 4d., are remitted, on the ground that these lands have been turned into forest;[7] and in 1456 and following years, £17, 10s. or £18 was allowed for the fermes of lands in Strathgartney which had become part of the forest of Glenfinlas.[8] In 1459, £5, 6s. are expended on the building of a hall and chamber at Glenfinlas,[9] a hunting lodge often alluded to in accounts beyond the period of this volume. In

1460 William Drummond got 12 bolls of oatmeal from the mill of Rednoch "pro odorencicis pascendis,"[1] and 1 boll 2 firlots of oatmeal are disbursed to the keeper of the King's "leporarii" while he was at Glenfinlas.[2] In more than one case compensation is given to tenants for the destruction of grain in the time of the King's hunting.[3]

In the reign of James II., as later, the lawless propensities of the M'Gregors gave trouble to their neighbours on the shores of Loch Katrine. In or about 1451, we are told, one Ewen M'Beth, tenant of the lands of Strongarvald in Strathgartney, was slain "per M'Gregouris," and his whole substance carried off, nothing attachable being left to pay his rent.[4]

Earldom of Strathern.—On the lapse to the Crown of the earldom of Strathern by the death of Sir Maurice Moray, it was bestowed by David II. on his nephew the Steward of Scotland, who, as Robert II., bestowed it in 1371 on David Stewart, the eldest of his sons by Euphemia Ross. Malise Graham, who had inherited the earldom as grandson of Earl David, was deprived of it by James I., on the pretext of its being a male fee; and the next Earl was Walter Earl of Athole, whose possession was merely a liferent, and on his death it again fell to the Crown.

An account has been preserved of this earldom of date 1380, when forfeited by David Stewart.[1] The earliest of the accounts of it as a Crown possession is dated in 1444, and goes back to 1442.[2] The accounts of 1444 and 1445 are rendered by Andrew Mercer of Inchbrakie, as Chamberlain of Strathern.[3] Between 1446 and 1449 the Strathern account is wanting; in 1450 the accountant is Sir David Moray of Tullibardine;[4] in 1452, Patrick Cumray, mair of Strathern;[5] in 1453, Robert Moray,[6] and in 1444 and 1445, William Moray of Tullibardine;[7] while in after years of this reign, Master Thomas Esok, as Chamberlain of Strathern and Menteith, renders account of both earldoms. The gross money rents of Strathern ranged during the period of these accounts from £316, 11s. 8d. to £461, 10s. No mention of rent in grain occurs; but twelve marts for the royal kitchen seems to have been exigible yearly, which were paid for at the rate of 5s. or 6s. 8d. a head, and driven to Stirling.[8]

[3] Vol. v. pages 170, 202, 246. This Andrew Mercer was grandson, by a younger son, of John Mercer, the financier and merchant prince of the previous century. In 1446 he is allowed the balance of his account—£69, 9s. 7½d.—for his faithful services to the King (vol. v. page 249); and in 1450 he is allowed £6, 13s. 4d. for expenses incurred by him when the King was at Inchbrakie (vol. v. page 419). Inchbrakie near Crieff, which he acquired by a wadset, was sold by his son Peter to William Lord Graham in 1501.

Foulis Wester, once the chief messuage, about the cultivation of whose grange there are some interesting details in the account of 1380, had by the time of James II. became a prison.[1] But a manor of Locherne is alluded to, for custody of which Andrew Mercer has in 1445 a fee of £10;[2] while in the following year 53s. 4d. are allowed him "pro custodia insule lacus de Erne,"[3] these entries seemingly indicating the existence of an island mansion.

Earldom of Athole.—The earldom of Athole, forfeited in 1437 by the treason of Walter Stewart, was bestowed by James II., in or shortly before 1457, on his brother uterine, Sir John Stewart of Balveny. Some perplexity has arisen from the fact that while Sir John Stewart is designed Earl of Athole as far back as 1457,[4] he has nevertheless on 18th March 1481–2, a charter from James III., conveying to him, as if for the first time, the earldom of Athole, and designing him Sir John Stewart of Balveny.[5] The explanation seems to be that the Queen's dower having been secured on the earldom of Athole, the alienation of it by the Crown during her lifetime was a questionable proceeding, and for the security of Earl John's right, it became important to have a confirmation of it after the death of Mary of Gueldres.

There is but one account of the earldom during the Crown's possession of it, of date 1450,[6] rendered by the same Robert Duncanson who apprehended the assassins of James I., the ancestor of the Robertsons of Strowan. The fermes, excluding the ward of Tulimet, amounted to £139, 13s. 4d.

Methven, Strathbraan, Apnadul, Strathurd, &c.—In addition to the three abovenoted earldoms, a large portion of Perthshire was in the direct possession of James II., including lands forfeited by Walter Stewart, but outside the proper earldom of Athole. In 1451 there begins a series of accounts of the fermes of Methven, Strathbraan, Apnadul, Fothergil, Glenlyon, Deschir, Toyer, and Rannoch, latterly combined with the accounts of Kincleven and Cluny.

Methven, which extended to the south as well as the west of Perth, was granted by Robert I. to his infant grandson, afterwards Robert II.,[1] who, when King, bestowed it on his son Walter, afterwards Earl of Athole, who founded the collegiate church there in 1433. Dumbarny and Pitcaithly, forming a part of that barony, lapsed to the Crown during the reign of James I., by a transaction narrated in this volume;[2] and the remainder of Methven was escheat on Athole's attainder. That

[1] Robertson's Index to Missing Charters, p. 9, No. 10.

[2] Page 243. Dumbarny and Pitcaithly had, it would appear, been granted by the Earl of Athole to Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas, to be held of him. Douglas having, without the consent of Athole his immediate superior, alienated them to Dundas of Dundas, Athole claimed them as escheat. The question of right was discussed in presence of James I. and the Court, and settled by the lands being resigned by Douglas to Athole, and by Athole to the King, who possessed them thereafter.

Methven Castle sustained a siege in 1444 or 1445, we know through the Exchequer Rolls,[1] but we are ignorant by whom it was occupied against the King. In 1450 or 1451, we find the King and Queen residing there;[2] and some details are preserved in the Strathern as well as the Methven accounts, about the cultivation of the grange of Methven.[3]

The barony of Strathbraan, so named from the Braan, which joins the Tay at Dunkeld, included Logy Almond, and extended beyond Crieff to Innerpeffry. Loch Fruchy, in the upper part of the Strath, was one of the King's hunting resorts. In the account of 1455, there is casual mention of the destruction of grain of poor people there.[4] Various items occur connected with the expenses at Loch Fruchy, "tempore venacionis," in August, September, and October 1455.[5] An entry of £24 occurs in the account of 1459, for building a hunting lodge at Loch Fruchy, with hall, chamber, kitchen, and four other "domus officinarum;[6] and in the following year the hall at Loch Fruchy is furnished with tables, seats, doors, and locks.[7] Strathbraan, along with Deschir and Toyer, the north and south shores of Loch Tay, were in the fourteenth century in the possession of Duncan Earl of Fife, and included in Countess Isabel's resignation of 1389.

The ancient Celtic monastery of Dull becoming secularised in the time of Abbot Crinan, its possessions, retaining the name of the "Abthania" or Abbacy, descended in the royal line,[1] but were gradually broken up; and the barony known as Apnadul in the reign of James II. was but a fragment of it. Glenlyon, Fothergil, and Rannoch, had all been parts of the Abthania. From 1456 onwards, allowance is made for Duchinloch in Apnadul and Mamlorne at the head of Glenlyon, converted into forest;[2] and Patrick M'Gilcallum gets 26s. 8d. a year as forester of Mamlorne.[3]

In 1455 the gross rental of Methven was £120, 8s, 4d., with 9 dozen poultry, and 3 chalders 8 bolls meal; of Strathbraun, £46; of Deschir and Toyer, £92, with 16 marts; of Glenlyon, £33, 6s. 8d.; of Fothergil, £16; of Apnadul, £51, 13s, 4d., with 14 marts; of Rannoch, £18, 6s. 8d.[4] There were separate mairs of Methven, Strathbraun, Apnadul, Glenlyon, and Fothergill,[5] also a mair of Deschir and Toyer, whose duties included the charge of the boat of the island of Loch Tay, and whose fee was therefore higher than the rest.[6]

[1] The accounts of 1373 inform us that the rents of Dull had been uplifted by Alexander Stewart, the "Wolf of Badenach" (vol. ii. page 425); and a great part of it had before 1397 been made over for life to Robert Duke of Albany, who, in lieu of its fermes, received an annuity of £130 (vol. iii. pages 427, 458, etc.; vol. iv. pages 69, 101, etc., and li.)

From 1451 to 1454 there is a separate yearly account of the lordship of Strathurd, including Kinclevin and the forest of Cluny.[1] Strathurd was a possession of the Earl of Fife, and included in Countess Isabel's resignation of 1389. In 1454, when Sir George Crichton resigned his newly-got earldom of Caithness to James II., and his disinherited son was besieged by the King in Blackness Castle, the Crown lands of Strathurd were, as a condition of that surrender, bestowed on James Crichton.[2] The fermes of Strathurd were rendered in 1451 as £60, 4s.[3]

Kinclevin, lying at the junction of the Isla with the Tay, was in early times Crown demesne, with a Castle, alluded to in the Exchequer accounts of the reign of Alexander II.[4] It was granted by Robert II. on 15th January 1382–3 to John Stewart, his illegitimate son by "Mora," with remainders to three sons of the King by Mariot Cardney.[5] At what date it again reverted to the Crown does not appear. Its fermes in 1451 were £67, 3s. 6d., and 48 salmon. There was a separate mair of Kinclevin.[6]

From the forest of Cluny a rent of £13, 6s. 8d. was received. In 1459 and following years we find its fermes assigned to Sir John Stewart of Cardney for life.[7]

Brechin and other lands in Angus.—In 1450 and 1451, we have accounts of the lordship of Brechin, including Navar, Ruthven on Isla, and Cortachy.[1] The balance of a previous account is brought over in that of 1450.

Margaret Barclay, heiress of Brechin, was wife of Walter Earl of Athole, who suffered death and attainder in 1437. Sir Thomas Maule of Panmure, heir-at-law of Margaret Barclay, endeavoured without success to establish a claim to Brechin, on the ground that that lordship had been possessed by Athole in his wife's right only, and held by him in courtesy after her death ;[2] and it has generally been assumed that the advisers of the Crown acted illegally in dealing with Brechin as if it had been forfeited by Athole's treason. But as the fee of Margaret's estates must from the time of his death have been in Robert Master of Athole, who suffered as a traitor with his grandfather, it was assuredly forfeited by him to the Crown, and her heir could have had no legal right to it, though a small portion was bestowed on him by royal favour.

Brechin and Cortachy were among the lands in which Mary of Gueldres was infeft in security of her dower, and were also among the annexations of 1455. In the account of 1451 the gross rent of Brechin, Navar, Ruthven, and Cortachy, is given as £133, 12s. 8d.[1] On the credit side of the account of 1452 is a payment for the Queen's sasine ox.[2] On 29th April 1452, the liferent of Ruthven on Isla was given to James Crichton, brother of Sir George Crichton of Cairnes.[3] A grassum of £10 is said in the Mar account of 1451 to have been received on reletting the lands of Brechin at Whitsunday of that year for a term of four years.[4]

Sir Thomas Maule, to whom allusion has been made, died, not as has been hitherto said in 1450, but in or before 1442. In 1445 we have an account of the barony of Panmure as in ward by his death,[5] in which the rent for five preceding terms is stated at £205, 13s. 4d.

Other lands in ward to the Crown in Forfarshire appear in the debit side of the Brechin accounts, including Kinnell, a possession of the Frasers of Lovat since 1390, said to be in ward for two terms before July 1451 by the death of Thomas Fraser of Lovat.[6] This Thomas Fraser, who must have died in or before 1450, and succeeded between 8th January 1436–7 and 20th July 1440, has no place in the Lovat genealogy, either as given by Douglas or in Anderson's "Family of Fraser."[7]

1460 we have the first of a series of accounts of three thanages in the Mearns which closely adjoin each other. Kincardine was in early times a royal seat; and the Exchequer accounts tell us that the thanages of Fettercairn, Aberluthnot, and Kincardine, with the park of Kincardine, were granted, apparently for life, to William Earl of Sutherland, in or before 1359.[1] In 1370 the reversion of them, on the contingency of the Earl of Sutherland's death, was given, on military tenure, to Walter Lesly and his wife Euphemia, afterwards Countess of Ross.[2] Kincardine was among the subjects reconveyed on her resignation to the nun-Countess of Ross in 1415, by the Regent Albany, with a new remainder—a transaction repudiated by James I.—and we find John Earl of Ross, son of the Alexander Lord of the Isles to whom that King restored the earldom of Ross, styled Lord of Kincardine. But part of Kincardine, with Fettercairn and Aberluthnot, continued in the possession of the Crown. The gross receipts from these three thanages for the two years ending July 1460 are put down as £142, 0s. 8d., and six marts.[3]

Among wards in this district separately accounted for is Glenbervie, of which, along with Kemnay or Donside, there is an account in 1441,[4] during the minority of the last Melville possessor, through whose daughter and grand-daughter Glenbervie was afterwards inherited by the Douglases.

Earldom of Carrick.—The earldom of Carrick, which had merged in the Crown on the accession of Robert Bruce, was granted by him to his brother Edward and the heirs male of his body.[1] Edward died in 1318 without lawful issue; and Robert I. made his son—afterwards David II.—Earl of Carrick. About 1332, David II. granted the earldom to Alexander Bruce, a natural son of Edward, who died the following year. An incomplete charter of the earldom of Carrick in 1361 to Sir William Cunningham is to be found in the Great Seal Register;[2] but by resignation or otherwise this fief was soon again in the King's hands, and on 22nd June 1368 was bestowed by David II. on John Stewart of Kyle, eldest son of the Steward of Scotland, and afterwards King Robert III. On his accession, Robert III. confirmed the earldom on his eldest son, afterwards Duke of Rothesay, on whose death it again reverted to the Crown, and was, on 16th December 1404, given to the King's remaining son James, but for his life only, along with the lands of the Steward of Scotland, erected together into a regality.[3]

[3] Lord Haddington's Collection, Advocates' Library; Carmichael's Tracts on the Peerage of Scotland, p. 113. James I., previously to his accession, is called Prince or Steward of Scotland, probably considered a higher title than Earl of Carrick, to which he had a right under the charter. The editor cannot concur in the common view that Prince James was Duke of Rothesay in virtue either of this charter or of that (no longer extant) of his elder brother. Often as he is mentioned in records and other writings during the four years that elapsed between his brother's death and his accession to the throne, he is nowhere de-

We have a series of brief accounts of the earldom of Carrick. Much of it was held blench by the Kennedy family, under charters from David Duke of Rothesay and Robert III.; and of the rest the Kennedys were the lessees. Gilbert Kennedy, nephew of James I. and brother of the Bishop of St. Andrews, in his account as heritable bailie of the earldom, rendered in August 1448, pays rent for the King's lands of Knoknonscheach, Girvanhede, and Turnberry, charging himself also with £113, 6s. 8d., and 100 marts, for intromissions prior to 1447.[1] Of these lands, Knoknonscheach was in ward; and the rents of the earldom, apart from wards, would appear in 1450 to be only £28, 13s. 4d.[2] Dundonald is sometimes included in the Carrick accounts.[3]

Cuningham, Kyle, Stewartown, Kilbride.—Cuningham was conveyed, by a charter of Robert Bruce, to Robert, son of Walter the High Steward and Marjory Bruce—afterwards Robert II.—in his infancy.[4] There are in 1457 and 1458 accounts of Alexander Cuningham, Lord Kilmaurs, as bailie of Cuningham,[5] the receipts of which consist of casualties only.

There is, in the audit of 1455, an account by signed Duke of Rothesay. James II., on the other hand, was in his father's lifetime habitually called Duke of Rothesay; but it is further noteworthy that in no known instance is the same title applied to James III. when heir apparent.

William Wallace of Cragy as bailie of Kyle Stewart, containing blench duties and reliefs, and extending over twenty years.[1] The western part of Kyle was among the Stewart possessions before the marriage of the Steward with Marjory Bruce: the eastern part, called in contradistinction from it King's Kyle, seems to be included in the accounts of the Sheriff of Ayr.

The lordship of Stewartown in Ayrshire, at one time possessed by the De Morevilles, was among the lands of the High Stewards before their accession to the throne. The Regent Albany granted a charter of it to his son John Earl of Buchan and Elizabeth Douglas his wife.[2] James I. bestowed it on 12th January 1426-7 on James Douglas of Balveny—afterwards seventh Earl of Douglas—to be held of the King as Steward of Scotland;[3] and it reverted to the Crown at the time of the Douglas forfeitures. There is an account of the serjeant of Stewartown at the audit of 1457.[4] The fermes are returned as £127, 13s. 4d. and 2 chalders 8 bolls meal; and a payment of 26s. 8d. for finding a suitor for Stewartown in the court of the bailie of Cuningham is ordered to be discontinued. In the Act of 1469 passed on the forfeiture of the Boyds, Stewartown is enumerated among the lands permanently annexed to the principality of Scotland.[5]

In 1450 and 1458 there are accounts, consisting of casualties only, of Alexander Lord Montgomery as bailie of East Kilbride in Lanarkshire, a barony of which Walter the High Steward had a charter on his marriage to Marjory Bruce,[1] and which is enumerated among the lands of the principality in the Act of 1469.

Bute and Arran.—More prominent and important are the accounts of Niel Jameson, chamberlain of Bute and Arran, embracing the whole reign of James II., the first of them rendered in June 1440 and going back seven terms.

Bute, of which the Stewards of Scotland had some sort of possession in the beginning of the thirteenth century,[2] seems, after various vicissitudes, to have been granted, along with Kintyre, to Robert the Steward—afterwards Robert II.—between 1314 and 1325. In 1366 the lands of the Steward in Bute—Cowal, Knapdale, Arran, and the Cumbrays—were of £1000 old extent.[3] The Menteiths held lands in Arran in the fourteenth century, which, in or about 1387, Janet Keith or Erskine, who had become representative of that family, resigned to the Crown in exchange for an annuity of £100 from the burgh fermes and fishings of Aberdeen.

During the reign of James II. the greater part of both islands was in the occupation of rentallers or kindly tenants, frequently designed "husbandi."[1] The rents, which are three times given in detail,[2] continue unchanged during the whole reign; but there is allusion in the account of 1440 to a letting of the lands of Bute, Arran, and Cowal, which perhaps took place on James' accession.[3]

The money fermes of Bute were £141, 18s. 6d., including £40 from the burgh of Rothesay;[4] in addition to which, by a rule from which the burgh was exempted, one boll of barley (or bear) was paid for every mark of money rent; these barley fermes, which by local usage were called grassums, being due at Martinmas only. Each tenant was also bound to furnish a mart to the royal table for every five marks of rent due by him, these marts being paid for at the rate of 5s. each. The money rent of Arran was nominally £56, 18s. 8d., with barley rents and marts computed as in Bute. It was the practice to transport the marts of Bute and Arran by water to Arnele (Portincross), whence they were driven to Edinburgh, Stirling, or Torwood.[5]

[4] Robert III. on 12th January 1400, granted to Rothesay a charter of erection as a burgh; but it had no feu charter till the reign of James VI.

A small part of both islands was held of the King or Prince on ward and blench tenures. In the accounts of 1459 and 1460 the rents of Ascog (probably then owned by a Glas) were accounted for as in ward, amounting, under deduction of terce, to £2.[1] The Fullartons of Kilmichael had a charter of lands in Arran in 1400.[2] Ardmaleish and Grennane in Bute, and Corrigills in Arran, were granted by charter of date 11th November 1400 to John Stewart, Sheriff of Bute, with £10 from the fermes of Bute.[3]

This John Stewart, whose name often occurs in the accounts, was one of the numerous natural sons of Robert II. The office of Sheriff was conferred on him when Bute and Arran were created into a sheriffdom—apparently in 1385—and he was confirmed in it by a charter of 11th November 1400.[4] His mother's name is said to have been Leich.[5] On

[5] A family of the name held lands blench in Bute. On 5th June 1429, John Leich, son of the late Gilzequhome, had a charter of Kyldavanan in Bute, which had belonged to his father, for a reddendo of 2d. or a pair of gloves (Reg. Mag. Sig., iii. 29). A regularly recurring item on the credit side of the Bute accounts is a remission to one Cristinus or Gilchrist Leich, of the fermes of Scoulogmore (afterwards of Kyrylawmond) occupied by him. It would almost seem that the calling indicated by his name was hereditary, for a payment appears in the Strathern account of 1444 of £3, 6s. 8d. to Cristinus Leich, a namesake if not the same person, for curing a retainer of the King dwelling with Sir Colin Campbell (vol. v. page 173). James III. confirmed a charter of date 11th May 1466, by Gilchrist Leich, to his son David Leich, of the same lands which are named in John Leich's charter (Reg. Mag. Sig., vii. 120.)

4th July 1419 he obtained from the regent Albany a confirmation charter to himself and his wife—a daughter of Sir John Semple of Eliotstoun—of Barone in Bute. Yearly payments, under a charter of Robert II., were made to him of £16, 13s. 4d. as Sheriff,[1] and of £40 as keeper of Rothesay Castle.[2] A sum of nine chalders barley, which he had on his own responsibility appropriated for the repair of that castle,[3] was continued as a debt against him, and after his death against his son.[4] John Stewart died before July 1449;[5] and his eldest son James succeeded him both in the sheriffship and in the custody of Rothesay Castle, receiving the like fees for these offices.[6] In 1454 the payment to James Stewart as Sheriff is accompanied with the remark "nichil importanti nec in officio ministranti de anno computi."[7]

Another son of the Sheriff, William Stewart, was keeper of Brodick Castle, for which, from 1444 to 1453, he was partly paid by the fermes of lands occupied by him in Arran.[8] In the last-named year the payment ceased, owing to the capture and destruction of that castle by Donald Balloch.[9]

Rothesay Castle, besides its keeper, had a constable, whose fee in money and marts is a regular item,[1] as are the fees of two watchmen and of the porter of the castle.[2] £12, 5s. 4d. was paid annually to two chaplains officiating, the one in the chapel of St. Michael, whose ruins are still to be seen inside the courtyard of Rothesay Castle, the other in that of St. Bride, which stood on the eminence above the town now known as Chapelhill.[3]

A passenger boat plied between Bute and Cowal, the ferryman of which received a boll of barley yearly until 1445, when the auditors ordered the payment to be discontinued.[4]

The slate quarries of Bute were in request. In 1445, 11s. 10d. are allowed for 13,000 slates (tegule lapidee) quarried by Robert Spens, and sent to Dumbarton to repair the King's Castle there.[5]

Arran was in a much less settled state than Bute, and the payment of the King's rents was by no means to be depended on. From 1443 to 1446 we have bitter complaints about "maledicti invasores" from Kintyre and Knapdale, who laid waste the country and ruined the crops,[6] and against one

On 10th August 1430, Lord Montgomery and Sir Robert Cunningham of Kilmaurs had a joint commission of the wardship of these lands to last seven years, which empowered them to use all or any means available to bring the people back to their allegiance, and also to let or feu the lands and levy the fermes for their own use (Reg. Mag. Sig., iii. 60).

Ranald M'Alister, who occupied lands extending along the whole west coast of the island, but persistently refused to pay rent in money, barley, or marts.[1]

On 14th April 1452 James II., in security of a loan of 800 marks received out of offerings made in Glasgow Cathedral in time of indulgences, granted to Bishop Turnbull, and failing him to the Dean and chapter of Glasgow, the Crown rents of Bute, Arran, and Cowal, with the customs of Ayr, Irvine, and Dumbarton, for ten years, to receive £100 yearly from these rents till the full sum was paid, and with leave to let the lands and distrain for the fermes.[2] In virtue of the power thus conferred on him, the Bishop took Arran into his hands, and let to M'Alister the whole fermes of the island, a step which had no good result.[3] The King is applied to in vain to order the Sheriff to distrain M'Alister's property; and things were in this condition on Turnbull's death in 1454, when the rolls tell us there is to be an accounting with the bishop's heirs, and a reference to the King.[4]

Alexander Lord Montgomery had on 22d May 1452 a charter for military service of lands in Arran, at least to some extent the same as those described as occupied by M'Alister (Reg. Mag. Sig., iv. 282). Montgomery, who had preceded William Stewart in the office of keeper of Brodick Castle (vol. v. page 163), also owned Sannox on the eastern side of the island, which he conveyed to his second son George in 1469 (charter printed in Fraser's Memorials of the Montgomeries, p. 24).

The shores of Arran supplied the royal household largely with the fish called "mullones," which the editor does not pretend to identify, and regarding whose purchase and transport to Dumbarton by water, and thence to Stirling and Edinburgh, repeated entries occur. In the accounts of 1444 and 1445 "mullones" were bought at the rate of 2s. a dozen.[1] In 1440 32s. worth were supplied, in 1444 twenty dozen, in 1445, fourteen dozen, and in 1446 six dozen.[2] In 1445 the expenses of the transit to Dumbarton, namely the hire of a boat or galley and expenses of nine sailors for twenty days, was £4, 10s., while the salt, the curing, the rent of a receptacle for them, and the carriage from Dumbarton to Stirling, amounted together to 20s.[3]

The Cumbrays, Cardross, Roseneath, &c.—The two Cumbrays are named among the possessions of the Steward of Scotland in 1366, and were among the lands granted in liferent by Robert III. to Prince James in 1404.[4] Their fermes, which are not accounted for by the chamberlain of Bute, but by the Sheriff of Dumbarton,[5] amounted to £33, 6s. 8d. in money, with barley and marts computed as in Bute. The Bute accounts contain an annual payment of £1 and a chalder of oatmeal to the keeper of the deer of the Lesser Cumbray,

William (afterwards John) Hunter, ancestor of the Hunters of Hunterston.[1]

In the two accounts of the Sheriff of Dumbarton in this volume, there further appear the fermes of Roseneath, £36, 13s. 4d., and of Cardross, £26, 13s. 4d., and the annualrent of Cadzow, £26, 13s. 4d.; and in the account of 1456, Roseneath, Cardross, the Cumbrays, and the annualrent of Cadzow are said to be granted by charter to the Sheriff (John Colquhoun of Luss), as keeper of Dumbarton Castle.[2]

Cardross had been royal property from the time when Robert Bruce acquired it:[3] Roseneath, where was a royal castle before the end of the twelfth century, had for a time been in the possession of Menteiths and Drummonds.[4] The charters under which the Hamiltons held Cadzow, though granted for military service, contained an annual reddendo in money, modified in amount, but always continued in the investitures, and often alluded to in the exchequer accounts, which had long been appropriated to the keeper of Dumbarton Castle. The annexations of 1455 included the castle of Dumbarton, with the lands of Cardross and Roseneath and the pension of Cadzow.

Cowal.—Cowal was an old Stewart possession. In the Bute account of 1440 mention is made of the letting of the lands of Cowal:[1] but the earliest of the extant Cowal accounts is rendered in 1445, taking in two years. The accountant is first Patrick Lawmondson, coroner of Cowal, and after 1450, John Lawmondson, bailie of Cowal. The only "terre firmate" are the lands of Dunoon, whose fermes were £18 yearly, and Glenderewel, which paid £13, 6s. 8d. and 44 marts. Among wards mentioned are those of Tollart (Toward), by the death of Gilbert Galbraith,[2] of the lands of the late Duncan Lawmondson,[3] and of certain possessions of the coheiresses of Rusky, Elizabeth and Agnes Menteith.[4]

The fermes of Dunoon were generally allowed to the keeper of Dunoon Castle, who in the earlier accounts is Robert Callendar or Walter Graham, and in 1451 Bishop Turnbull of Glasgow.[5] Mention has already been made of a security granted in 1452 to the Bishop of Glasgow over the fermes of Bute, Arran, and Cowal. On the credit side of the account of 1454 is a payment of £93, 3s. 4d. in money and 88 marts, made to Bishop Turnbull to account.[6] After Turnbull's death the custody of Dunoon Castle is entrusted to another ecclesiastic, the Bishop of Lismore, who has £72 paid him in 1455, and afterwards the fermes of Dunoon for life, by an indenture which obliged him to keep the castle in repair.[7]

Earldom of March.—George Dunbar 10th Earl of March, driven into rebellion by the affront offered his daughter by the Duke of Rothesay, was attainted in 1400. His earldom included the larger part of Berwickshire and Haddingtonshire; he had also large possessions in Ayrshire, Lanarkshire, and Galloway, and he had inherited Annandale through his mother, the heroic daughter of Thomas Randolph. On his forfeiture, his earldom was conferred on David Duke of Rothesay,[1] on whose death it reverted to the Crown. In 1409 the Regent Albany reversed March's attainder, restoring to him his earldom and a portion of his other possessions. The son and successor of this earl, George 11th Earl of March, was in 1434 suddenly deprived by James I. of his earldom and all his other lands except Kilconquhar in Fife, on the plea that Albany's act of grace to his father had been in excess of the powers of a regent. The earldom of March remained with the Crown till conferred by James II., in or shortly before 1455, on his infant son Alexander, afterwards Duke of Albany.

The extant accounts of this earldom go on from 1451 to the close of the reign. The accountant is at first Patrick Hepburn Lord Hailes, who is also Sheriff of Berwick, afterwards Simon Salman, mair of the earldom, in conjunction with Thomas Hume as bailie, and Robert Liddale, keeper of Dunbar Castle. The gross rents of the "terre firmate" are sometimes returned as above £570; the castle wards, whose amount is £22, 2s. 4d., form a usual item on the charge side, and the "redditus assise" and justice ayres appear sometimes in the account of the earldom, sometimes in that of the sheriffdom of Berwick.

Bower asserts that when James I. dispossessed the 11th Earl of March, he made him Earl of Buchan, and that Parliament, after the accession of James II., granted to him and his son Patrick an annuity of 400 marks from the rents of the earldom.[1] According to another authority he was belted Earl of Buchan by James I., and got an annuity of £40, which, after the death of James I. was continued by Parliament until the majority of his successor.[2] There seems no reason to believe that he ever enjoyed either the lands or the title of Buchan; and there is as little evidence that he received the annuity specified in the Scotichronicon.[3]

Annandale.—The lordship of Annandale, inherited by George 10th Earl of March through his mother Agnes Randolph, was, on his resignation, conferred by the Regent Albany, by a charter dated 24th October 1409, on Archibald 4th Earl of Douglas and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to the Earl of March.[1] William 6th Earl of Douglas and his brother David, who were put to death in Edinburgh Castle in 1440, were the last heirs male of the body of the 4th Earl; and on their death Annandale vested in the Crown, as coming in place of the attainted Earl of March.[2]

[3] The whole sums entered as paid to him are £3, 6s. 8d. in 1450, £8 in 1451, and £40 in 1452 (vol. v. pages 383, 435, 497) from the customs of Edinburgh, and £26, 13s. 4d. from the rents of the Earldoms of March and Fife in 1454 (vol. v. pages 644, 685). His son Patrick, who must have died in his father's lifetime, and between Martimas 1453 and the audit of 1454 (vol. v. pages 582, 644), is mentioned as having wrongfully uplifted the fermes of Letham and Mersington, amounting to £57, 13s. 4d., in 1453. Elizabeth, wife and afterwards widow of Patrick, had an annuity of £20 (vol. v. page 582; vol. vi. page 590), and, in 1459 and 1460 the rents of one third of Pitcox, amounting to £6, 13s. 4d. (page 540). An annuity of £10 was paid to Euphemia Dunbar, a daughter of the last Earl of March (page 590).

The office of Steward of Annandale had existed as far back as the time of Thomas Randolph.[3] On 8th February 1409–10, Archibald 4th Earl of Douglas, and Lord of Galloway and Annandale, conferred the Stewardship of Annandale on Sir Herbert Maxwell of Carlaverock, with the power of holding courts and levying their issues, and with an annuity of £20 from the issues of his courts,[4] payable, failing these, by the Chamberlain, and a right to all fines not exceeding 18s. This charter was confirmed by James II. on the 6th August 1440, a few weeks before Annandale became a royal possession.[5] By that event the Earl's Steward became King's Steward, and the office continued hereditary for more than two hundred years in the Maxwell family.

The first account of Herbert Lord Maxwell as Steward of Annandale was rendered on 26th June 1449, and purports to go back to the date when Annandale lapsed to the Crown, that is, 1440.[1] The rents of the "terre firmate," namely the demesne lands of Lochmaben, Hetach (Hightae), and Smallholm near Lochmaben, and the fishings of the Annan, amounted together to £30.[2] The casualties however were important, the wards including Dryfesdale and other lands held by Chancellor Crichton and his son, which we find bestowed on Sir John Carlile, in acknowledgment of his aid in the final struggle with the Douglases. The Johnstons also first come into notice at this time. The Castle of Lochmaben, one of the most important border fortresses, was in the keeping of John Carruthers of Mousewald, when, on some unex-

[1] The note of evidents on which the Decreet of Ranking of the nobility of Scotland (1606) is founded, suggests that earlier accounts of this stewardry existed in the now lost rolls containing the accounts of the Sheriffs. "In rotulo compotorum vicecomitum, computum Herberti domini de Maxwell, militis, senescalli vallis Anandie, 27 Juni anno 1444 and 1447, James II." There are certainly instances in the Exchequer Rolls where an account overlaps and includes a previous one. But these "Notes of Evidents," in all the forms in which we have them, seem to be not the original jottings, but copies of them; and it is possible that the accounts of 26th June 1447 and 25th November 1452 (vol. v. pages 357, 520) may have been meant.

[2] The auditors also laid claim on the part of the Crown to certain lands of Charles Moray of Cockpule, ancestor of the Stormont family, a claim resisted by him apparently on just grounds, inasmuch as on 22d April 1452 he had a confirmation under the Great Seal of a charter of them in his favour by the Earl of Douglas (vol. v. page 670; vol. vi. pages 62, 171, 447, 552; Reg. Mag. Sig., iv. 87).

plained ground, two sons of Sir Adam Johnston took possession of it. This occurred in August 1454,[1] shortly before the battle of Arkinholm, where Sir Adam is said to have distinguished himself by capturing the Earl of Ormond. Johnston dying soon afterwards, his family were taken into royal favour. Herbert Johnston was allowed to supplant Carruthers as keeper of Lochmaben; and John, son and successor of Sir Adam, had his non-entry and relief duties remitted,[2] and got the ward of Drumgray.[3] Andrew Stewart, Warden of the Marches, afterwards Lord Avondale and Chancellor, is keeper of Lochmaben Castle in 1456,[4] and Sir John Carlile in 1460.[5]

Galloway.—The accounts of Galloway, which begin on the attainder of the Douglases, are of considerable importance. The lordship of Galloway, i.e., Galloway between the Nith and Cree, was bestowed by David II. on Archibald Douglas, natural son of the "good Sir James," and afterwards third Earl of Douglas. West Galloway or Wigtown was erected into an earldom by the same King in favour of Sir Malcolm Fleming; but he, and his son who succeeded him, found themselves unable to cope with their overgrown neighbours; and the result was a sale of his earldom by Fleming to Douglas with the King's sanction. The Earl of Douglas retained both Galloways until their forfeiture, on which event both were entrusted to the charge of William Abbot of Dundrennan, who, as chamberlain of Galloway, exercised to a certain extent a concurrent jurisdiction with the Sheriff of Wigtown and the Steward of Kirkcudbright. The gross money revenue from the farmed lands of East Galloway was £562, 3s. 4d. in 1456, and £356, 4s. 5½d. in 1460; of West Galloway £189 in the former year, and £115, 4s. 5d. in the latter;[1] and there were also considerable rents in oatmeal, computed in the great boll of Galloway,[2] and in marts, for which 5s. a head was received.[3] Many of the tenandries appearing in the rental are shown by the discharge side of the account to be occupied by quondam vassals of the Douglases possessing under charters, of which they had in some instances obtained confirmations from the Crown.

As might be expected, justice ayres and fines and escheats of persons convicted at them figure prominently in the Galloway accounts. In that of 1456 the escheats in oatmeal amounted to 44 chalders 2 bolls Galloway measure.

Kirkcudbright and Wigtown were burghs of regality before the forfeiture of the Douglases; and not only the fermes of both, but, except during the reigns of James I., the customs of Kirkcudbright, which were considerable, were received by the Earls of Douglas and not the Crown. After the Douglas attainders Wigtown and Kirkcudbright became royal burghs, Kirkcudbright by charter dated 26th October 1455, and the fermes of both and customs of Kirkcudbright appear either in the account of the chamberlain of Galloway or in the burgh rolls.

Occasional notices occur of two different branches of the Douglas family who continued in Galloway as crown vassals after the expulsion of their chief. One were the Douglases of Leswalt, of illegitimate descent, whose possessions were in the north-west of Wigtownshire. William Douglas of Leswalt was Sheriff of Wigtown in 1424. James I. confirmed on 18th March 1426–7 a grant made to him of lands in both East and West Galloway by his sister the Duchess of Touraine;[1] and other lands (Mule, Gartiriyane, Larg, Auchmattel, and Balkeir) are in the accounts of 1456 and 1457 claimed by him, as granted by charter by the same lady.[2] By the death of his son and successor George Douglas these very considerable possessions lapsed to the Crown.

The other branch of the Douglas family alluded to belonged to the house of Dalkeith. James Douglas, son and successor of the first Lord Dalkeith, nephew of James I. and father of the first Earl of Morton, was placed under curatory as insane in 1441;[3] and some sort of right to Dalkeith must have been acquired by his younger brother

Henry, erroneously called his son in the ordinary pedigrees.[1] This Henry, on his marriage with Margaret Douglas, had from his father a charter of Borg and other lands in Galloway and Annandale,[2] which the first Lord Dalkeith had held from the Earls of Douglas, to him and his wife conjointly. In virtue of this charter Margaret Douglas retained Borg in her widowhood; but in the account of 1457 she is said to be attainted, and her estate of Borg escheat to the Crown; though she retains possession of it by permission of the King, and has besides, under the designation of "domina de Dalketh," her terce from Aumornes, Culegnaw, and Preston.[3] Her son Hugh Douglas has a chalder of meal allowed him, apparently for assistance given by him to the Abbot of Dundrennan in his office of

[1] That the relationship was as we have stated, is shown by a confirmation in the Great Seal Register on 2d January 1451–2 (iv. 161) of a feu-charter by James Lord Dalkeith and Henry, designed as his brother, of subjects in Dalkeith. This must have been the Lord Dalkeith who was under curatory, as he survived till 1456. It may be also noted that a charter by the first Lord Dalkeith is witnessed by his son Henry (see confirmation in Reg. Mag. Sig., iii. 162, 12th March 1439–40).

[2] In 1406, James Lord Dalkeith had a precept of sasine from Archibald Earl of Douglas in Butil, Preston, and Borg.

[3] Pages 196, 344, 347, 451, 568, 641, 642. This Margaret seems to have been the daughter of James seventh Earl of Douglas, and sister of the eight and ninth Earls. According to Hume of Godscroft, Margaret, eldest daughter of the seventh Earl, was "wife to the Lord of Dalkeith;" and accordingly Crawfurd and subsequent peerage writers have made her the first wife of the Lord Dalkeith who became insane, though there seems to be no other evidence that he had any wife except Elizabeth Giffard. If, on the other hand, this Margaret is to be identified with the "domina de Dalketh," the wife of Henry Douglas (also styled "of Dalkeith,") and not of his elder brother, the attainder of the lady mentioned in the rolls is sufficiently accounted for, as, by the then existing treason law of Scotland, she would be involved in the treason of her mother the Countess of Douglas.

chamberlain of Galloway;[1] and at a period beyond that covered by this volume, we find him, as Hugh Douglas of Borg, renouncing to his cousin the Earl of Morton all right to Dalkeith, except what might accrue to him on the contingency of the failure of that earl's issue male.[2]

There are various notices in the Galloway accounts, and in those of the Sheriff of Dumfries, of the Stewarts of Dalswinton, including a puzzling passage about the marriage of Sir William Stewart of Dalswinton (the son of Marion Stewart, heiress of Dalswinton, by Sir John Stewart of Jedworth), with a lady rather mysteriously called "domina Elizabeth."[3]

Other Galloway families about whom genealogists will find information, include the M'Lellans, Agnews, Griersons, Vauses, and Adairs. Andrew Agnew, whose account as Sheriff of Wigtown was rendered in 1456, has 6 chalders of oatmeal paid him "ex consideracione auditorum ad presens" in respect of the burning of his grain, and the death of his father in the King's service.[1] The accounts tell us that Barenglass and Barnbarroch were sold by William Earl of Douglas to Robert Vaus, and the transaction confirmed by the King.[2]

[3] "Allocate compotanti per concessionem factam per dominum regem ad maritagium filie domine Elizabeth, sponse nunc domini Willelmi Stewart de Dalswyntown, militis. . . . l li." (page 169). The words "filie domine Elizabeth" cannot mean "the King's daughter Elizabeth," as James could not in 1456, being but 26 years old, have had a marriageable daughter, legitimate or illegitimate. The words must mean "the daughter of Lady Elizabeth." But who was this Lady Elizabeth? Her designation suggests near relationship to the royal house. But neither Elizabeth, sister of James II., who was married in 1442, nor still less a daughter of the Black Knight of Lorn, could have a marriageable daughter in 1456; and on the other hand, no daughter of Elizabeth, sister of James I., and wife of Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, could be young enough to answer the required conditions.

Stewartry of Kirkcudbright.—We have a short account of the Steward of Kirkcudbright for each of the last five years of this reign, containing chiefly blench-duties and casualties. Though Kirkcudbright was, nominally at least, within the sheriffdom of Dumfries, the Steward of Kirkcudbright exercised under the Douglases powers similar to those of a Sheriff, and the Earl's Steward became the King's Steward on the annexation of Kirkcudbright to the Crown.

Eskdale.—Eskdale, which had been granted to Sir James Douglas by Robert Bruce,[3] remained in possession of the family till their forfeiture, and on 28th January 1458–9 was conveyed by charter to George Earl of Angus.[4] An account of Sir Simon of Glendonwyn, as bailie of Eskdale,[5] is confined to the issues of three justice ayres at Dumfries, which he received by special mandate from the King, amounting to £1105, but diminished by compositions nearly to half that sum. Dalblane, the chief messuage, is said by the accountant to have been granted to the Earl of Angus; Dalbeth, to

John and Nicholas Batyson, in consideration of the slaughter of their brother by the Douglases the night before Arkinholm, and of good service done by them at that engagement; and Whiteshiels to another member of the Batyson family for similar services.

Ettrick Forest.—From the date of the Douglas forfeitures onwards, we have accounts of Ettrick Forest.[1] The district known as the Forest of Ettrick or of Selkirk, or simply "The Forest," in early times Crown property, was among the subjects granted by Robert Bruce, both separately and by the "emerald charter," to Sir James Douglas.[2] It was also included in the charter of the Douglas possessions to William of Douglas, afterwards first Earl;[3] and the regality of the Forest of Ettrick was confirmed to Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas by Robert III.[4] That James I. had got his nephew, the fifth Earl of Douglas, to give up some part of his rights in the Forest appears, both from a clause in the confirmation by James II. to Earl William,[5] and from a payment in the accounts or 1434 of £4 for 6 barrels of tar for the King's sheep in the Forest of Selkirk.[1]

The accounts inform us that the Forest consisted of three Wards, corresponding to the valleys of the Ettrick, Tweed, and Yarrow, and bearing the names of these rivers, and that each of them was under the charge of two rangers (cursores), one of them called master ranger, and divided into possessions called forester's steads, paying £6 of yearly rent. There was also a rent in cows, marts, and lambs, which, though not entered in the accounts in the present volume, appears in full detail in those of the next reign.[2] The Ward of Ettrick contained 45, Yarrow 23½, and Tweed 17 forester's steads; and there were also in Yarrow and Tweed two quarter-holdings called hamlets (hamillots) paying but 30s. of rent, and in Tweed one "bondelesoure"—the pasture land of a labourer—paying 13s. 4d. The gross money rent of the Forest was £519, 13s. 4d., paid on Allsaints day and St Peter ad Vincula (1st August).

In 1466 and following years, Thomas Cranstoun of that ilk was bailie of the Forest, Sir Walter

[2] Each forester's stead paid one "bowkow," generally also one "fogmart" and one "fulemart," and often either ten or twenty lambs in addition. The hamlets and "bondelesoure" were exempt from these payments. Vol. vii. pages 524–531.

Scott and Adam Scott rangers of Ettrick, William Middlemast and Robert Liddale of Yarrow, and George Pringle and David Pringle of Tweed. Each ranger had a fee of £6 yearly; and William Schevil, clerk of the courts and office of the Forest, had £6 from Kershope. Three holdings in Ettrick were in the King's occupation, and two in Yarrow in that of the Queen. Twenty-six shillings were paid for taking charge of the King's sheepfold. The wife of James Lord Hamilton, who was widow of Archibald fifth Earl of Douglas, had her terce from Wynterburgh, Eltreif, Berrybus, and Douglas Crag.[1]

Repeated mention occurs of Courts (Beltane Court and Allhallow Court) held by Lord Hamilton and Ninian Spot at Newark, the principal messuage of the Forest, and of the repair and roofing of houses there.[2] One William Robysone has his rent remitted in consideration of the destruction of his meadow by the horses of the King when at Newark.[3] In the account of 1456, certain "Scoti silvestres" get 12 bolls of oatmeal when the King was in the Forest, the persons so designed being doubtless performers in a sort of revel or masque, common in those days, who disguised themselves in the skins of wild animals.[4] The following year no less than 35 bolls of meal were bestowed on revellers of the same sort who played before the King at Melrose.[5]

Earldom of Mar.—The earldom of Mar has its revenues accounted for in 1438, and afterwards from 1451 onwards, under conditions which require explanation, and on which the accounts themselves throw some light.

That earldom, comprising about half the present county of Aberdeen, went in the fourteenth century, along with the smaller earldom of Garioch, to two successive Countesses in their own right,—Margaret, by marriage Countess of Douglas, and her daughter Isabel. Reference has been made in the preface of a previous volume[1] to a memorable incident of 1404,—the raptus of Countess Isabel by Alexander Stewart, natural son of the "Wolf of Badenach." After laying siege to that lady's castle of Kildrummy, and compelling her to become his wife, Stewart extorted from her a charter, of date 12th August 1404, which, had the King confirmed it, would have given both earldoms, failing issue of the marriage, to his heirs instead of hers. Robert III., however, refused the confirmation which was essential to its validity, but agreed to a compromise, in virtue of which, after a dramatic scene at Kildrummy, of which Alexander's renunciation of the charter alluded to formed part, Isabel granted, on 9th December 1404, a new charter, which, though it conferred on her husband a liferent right, gave the remainder to her own heirs in the earldoms. This second charter was duly confirmed by the King, so that it became the ruling investiture of both earldoms. Countess Isabel soon died childless, and the rights of her next heir were thus suspended till Alexander Stewart's death.

That next heir was the head of the house of Erskine. The sister of Donald Earl of Mar, who fell at Dupplin, and aunt of Countess Margaret of Douglas and Mar, had married Sir John Menteith; and her daughter and heir Christian was mother of Janet Keith, wife, first of Sir David Barclay of Brechin, by whom she had a daughter (who married Walter Stewart Earl of Athole), and secondly of Sir Thomas Erskine, by whom she had a son, Robert, her heir.

But Alexander Stewart, though, as has been seen, only a liferenter, began to act as if he had been fiar, or in other words, as if his investiture had been that of the 12th August, not of the 9th December 1404. In 1420 he is discovered bargaining with Murdach Duke of Albany for a new charter in favour of a natural son, Thomas Stewart;[1] and after James' return from captivity, he resigned both earldoms to the King, and received them again by charter of 28th May 1426 to himself in liferent, and that natural son and his heirs male in fee, with a final remainder to his own heirs.[2] A passage in the Mar account of 1456 further suggests that in implement of the indenture of 1420, there had been a resignation to Duke

[1] Vol. iv. preface, page lxxxi. [2] Reg. Mag. Sig., ii. 8.

Murdach, and re-grant by him, and that it was to obviate any doubts as to the competency of such a transaction by a regent that the charter of 1426 was granted.[1] The re-grant, however, whether by regent or King, was fundamentally inept, inasmuch as the resigner was only a liferenter; and on Alexander's death, which preceded that of James I. by about a year, Erskine was undoubtedly in right to the earldoms. But the predecease of Alexander's natural son without issue had afforded the King a pretext to step in, either under the re-grant of 1426, or in virtue of the unconfirmed charter of 1404. Patent as was the flaw in the King's title under either alternative, James I., in this as in other cases, felt himself strong enough to set private right at defiance.

With the accession of a sovereign in minority, the rightful heir, more hopeful of redress for this high-handed injustice, proceeded to establish his right by two services before the Sheriff of Aberdeen, on 22d April and 16th October 1438, on the retour of one at least of which he had sasine.

On the 8th July 1438, that is, between the date of the two services, we have an account of Sir Adam Falconer as chamberlain of Mar and Garioch,[2] in which the rents of Mar for two years

[1] Page 267. The narrative is altogether of a loose description. Countess Isabel is called Euphemia Countess of Mar; and the resignation is said to have been in the hands of Robert Duke of Albany, which the tenor of the indenture of 1420 shows could not have been the case.

[2] Vol. v. page 54.

back, i.e. from Alexander Stewart's death, are returned as belonging to the Crown. The rents of Garioch are not in the account, this reason being assigned for their omission, that Garioch had been assigned by the late King to his niece the Countess of Buchan, first conjunctly with her husband (Sir Thomas Stewart, the abovenamed natural son of Alexander Stewart), and afterwards in her widowhood.[1] This account shows that James I., during the year that followed his assuming possession of Mar, had visited his new acquisition,[2] set on foot new buildings at Kildrummy Castle, and interested himself in the granges belonging to the principal manors; and it exhibits Strathdon as a pre-eminently cattle-rearing and horse-rearing country.

The circumstance that what remains of Kildrummy Castle is built of a hewn freestone, unlike any stone of the district, and its architectural character, resembling the Welsh castle of the Edwardian period rather than anything else in Scotland, make it probable that this remarkable stronghold was built during the occupation of Scotland by Edward I., about the close of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century. The payments to quarrymen,

[1] Vol. v. page 55. This lady, a daughter of Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas, who survived till about 1451 (vol v. page 516), was wife, first of John Stewart Earl of Buchan, son of Robert Duke of Albany, secondly of Sir Thomas Stewart, and third, beyond the date of this account, of William St. Clair Earl of Orkney. Her possession of Garioch was of course as objectionable in point of law as the King's possession of Mar.

[2] The King's household expenses at Kildrummy Castle in the year 1436 are put down as £23, 0s. 8d. Vol. v. page 57.

masons, and others for bringing and hewing stones from the Kildrummy quarries, show that the works executed by James were in the granite of Mar. These included the rebuilding of the stone chimney, four great locks for the castle door, and the repairing and roofing of the chapel, whose triple lancet window is still a distinguishing feature of this noble ruin.[1] Lord Gordon, father of the first Earl of Huntly, had his fee as keeper of Kildrummy Castle.

From the date of this Mar account, the Exchequer and other records indicate a disputed possession between the Crown and Lord Erskine. The accounts of Mar cease, though we have accounts of the other Crown rents north of the Dee. Lord Erskine grants charters as Earl of Mar and Lord Erskine, while the King, in confirming them, gives him the latter designation only. He is made a burgess of Aberdeen as Earl of Mar on 28th December 1439; and, what is more remarkable, his right is virtually recognised in the audited Exchequer accounts of 1446, by the mention of his son under the designation "Thomas de Erskine, magister de Marr."[2] The Crown, however, kept possession of Kildrummy Castle, as did the widow of Sir Thomas Stewart of Garioch. On 10th August 1440, the representatives of the Crown enter into an indenture postponing the decision of the question of right until the King's majority (16th October 1451), but allowing Erskine in the meantime to draw the rents, under obligation to account if the right should be found to be in the Crown. It was stipulated that Kildrummy Castle was to be delivered into Erskine's custody, who, this done, was to surrender the fortress of Dumbarton, of which he was keeper.[1]

But the King, or those who acted for him, failed to implement their part of the agreement. In 1442 Earl Robert, after twice formally protesting against Chancellor Crichton for his refusal to put him in possession of Kildrummy, and retention of his retour to Garioch, followed up his protests by laying siege to and capturing Kildrummy Castle. Dumbarton, which by the tenor of the indenture was to have been surrendered in exchange for Kildrummy, had about that date passed out of Erskine's hands, having been wrested from his deputy Sir Robert Semple by Patrick Galbraith,[2] whose act was, as the Exchequer accounts show, easily condoned ;[3] but the King seized in its stead Erskine's castle of Alloa.

The next proceeding was a charge under the Privy Seal, of date 22d May 1448,[4] to Erskine and his son to surrender the castle of Kildrummy, which Sir David Moray of Tullibardine, and Robert Livingstone, the Comptroller, were empowered to receive from him; and on 20th June following an indenture was entered into between the King and Erskine,[1] by which the latter agreed to deliver up Kildrummy before 7th July following, and until the King's majority, James restoring Alloa to him. That Kildrummy was accordingly given up to Livingstone, appears from an entry in the Aberdeen customs' account of 9th September 1448, for the expenses of the keepers of Kildrummy Castle from the date of its recovery ("recepcionis") by the Comptroller until its delivery to the charge of Archibald of Dundas.[2] But the Crown officers, as soon as they had recovered Kildrummy, broke faith with Earl Robert; and we find Sir Thomas Erskine protesting in his father's behoof, both on 4th April 1449 and on 26th January 1449–50, against his non-fulfilment of his part of the indenture, and his taking advantage of his possession of Kildrummy to uplift and appropriate the rents of the earldom.[3] Accordingly, from this date the revenues of Mar begin again to appear among the Crown receipts, the first audited account of Mar being dated 14th July 1451, going back two terms, and containing a detailed rental of the whole lands of the earldom.[4]

Although James II. came of age on 16th October

[1] Quoted from the Mar charter-chest in Douglas' Peerage, edition 1764, p. 467. [2] Vol. v. page 306. [3] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. pp. 60, 61. [4] Vol. v. page 459.

1451, no steps were for a considerable time taken to have Erskine's rights enquired into. But the Countess of Orkney, widow of Sir Thomas Stewart, being dead, James, on 26th August 1452, made a gift of "terras comitatus nostri de Garioch" to his Queen for life.[1]

Robert Lord Erskine and Earl of Mar, who had so steadily resisted the usurpation of the Crown, was an aged man when he had to surrender Kildrummy, and died some time between 26th January 1449–50 and 21st March 1452–3.[2] His son—the "magister de Marr" of 1446—possessed less force of character, and was more easily dealt with by Chancellor Crichton. On 21st March 1452–3, he appeared in Parliament as a suppliant for justice as to both earldoms. A formal judicial determination of the question had been promised to his father; but he had to content himself with Crichton's assurance that the matter would be inquired into on the King's visit to the north soon after Whitsunday. The enquiry, however, was postponed; while the unsettled state of the question, if it prevented the earldom of Mar appearing among the lands annexed to the Crown in the Act of 1455, did not restrain the King from treating Mar as his own in the matter of the excambion of Muchal and Corntoun in 1456.[3]

[2] These are the dates of the two protests of his son already alluded to, one running in his father's name, the other in his own name.

The promised enquiry took place at a justice ayre at Aberdeen, where an assize of error was held in the presence of the King and Crichton, of which more need not here be said than that the retours of 1438 were reduced on the palpably untenable ground that the investiture of the earldom of Mar was Countess Isabel's unconfirmed charter of 12th August 1404, and not the confirmed charter of 9th December following.[1] Between June 1458 and June 1459, James bestowed the earldom of Mar on his fourth and youngest son John, then an infant, whose "sasine ox" is entered in the account audited at the last-named date.[2]

[1] See above, page cxviii. A detailed account of the proceedings has been preserved, which must be numbered among the curiosities of Scottish jurisprudence. It is printed at length in the Antiquities of the Shires of Aberdeen and Banff, iv. pp. 205–213; and a graphic yet accurate abstract, divested as much as possible of technical phraseology, will be found in Lord Crawford's "Earldom of Mar," i. pp. 282–296.

[2] Page 516. The words "domino Johanni terciogenito domini regis" in this passage can only mean the third son then alive. Certain dates in the rolls in this volume, taken along with other documents, seem to put the seniority of the children of James II. beyond question, a subject on which the following notes may be useful:—

James II. married Mary of Gueldres on 3rd July 1449. The issue were—

1. A child born 19th May 1450, which survived a few hours (Asloan MS. pp. 26, 43).

2. James (afterwards James III.), born 10th July 1451 (vol. v. page lxxxviii.).

3. Mary must have been next to James, as on 16th May 1452 she is at Falkland, on her way from Stirling to St. Andrews (vol. v. page 537). She was wife of Thomas Boyd Earl of Arran, and afterwards of Lord Hamilton.

4. Alexander, Earl of March before 8th July 1455 (page 63); Duke of Albany before 3rd July 1458 (page 44).

5. David. Had a charter of the Earldom of Moray 12th February 1455–6, in which he is designed third lawful son of James II. (MS. note by late John Riddell in Advocates' Library). Is called Earl of Moray in accounts of October 1456 (pages 280, 291). In the Comptroller's account of that date, the King's three sons are enumerated in order as the Prince, the Earl of March, and the Earl of Moray, and Lady Mary, is given as the only

The gross money rents of the earldom of Mar, as given in the account of 1455, and also in those of 1459 and 1460, are—Strathdee, £110, 6s. 8d.; Strathdon, £168; Cromar, £92, 16s. 8d.; and Muchal, £25, 6s. 8d.; in all £396, 10s. Muchal, though entered in the charge side of the accounts, was, as has been explained, granted to Thomas Fraser in exchange for Corntoun. Mar also paid 30⅛ marts, for each of which 5s. was allowed; and 2 chalders 4 bolls 2 firlots of "custom oats," for each boll of which 4d. was allowed.[1]

Archibald Dundas, who, it has been seen, got the custody of Kildrummy on its recovery by the Crown in 1448, is in the account of 1451 superseded by James Lord Crichton, who had £100 for his salary, and occupied rent free the granges of Kildrummy and Migvy.[2] The Earl of Huntly is keeper with the same salary at Martinmas 1452; and Lord Glammis succeeded him in 1456.[3] The keeper of daughter (page 291). He must have been dead before 18th July 1457, as there is an entry of that date for the expenses "quondam domini David comitis Moravie" (page 355).

6. John. That he was not born till after October 1456, seems to be indicated by the Comptroller's account as above; and the earliest mention of him in the Rolls is in June 1459, when the payment to the Sheriff of Aberdeen for his sasine ox in the Earldom of Mar shows that he was made Earl of Mar between 21st June 1458 and 23rd June 1459.

7. Margaret. The non-occurrence of her name in the accounts of this reign, even those audited in July 1460, where there are furnishings for all the other royal children then living nominatim (page 583), leads to the conclusion that she was born very shortly before her father's death. Her history belongs to the two next reigns, aud much light is thrown on it by Mr. Dickson in his preface to the Treasurer's Accounts, vol. i. page cclxxxvii.

Kindrocht, a less responsible officer, had a salary of £6, 13s. 4d., besides payment in marts. The office was exercised by Alexander Stewart of Strathdee, son of a brother of the late Alexander Earl of Mar, afterwards by Lord Glammis.[1] There was also a "thoshachderach," or coroner of Mar, with a salary of £6, 13s. 4d.; and four mairs, who had each £1.[2]

Coull and Oneil.—The districts known as Coull and Oneil, whose rents appear in the accounts between Dee and Spey, were in early times a part of the earldom of Mar, but were made over to Alan Durward, to compromise a question raised by him regarding Earl Morgund's legitimacy. Durward's lands were divided between his three daughters,[3] and probably by marriage with one of them, Coull and Oneil came into possession of Duncan Earl of Fife. On 12th August 1389, on the resignation of Isabel Countess of Fife, Earl Duncan's daughter, they were conferred on Robert Duke of Albany;[4] and Albany granted them to his son John Earl of Buchan, and his issue male, with remainder to Andrew and Robert, also his sons, and their issue male.[5] Under this remainder Coull and Oneil reverted to the Crown, and in 1443 and afterwards are said to be the King's property, the rents being recovered by Sir Alexander Forbes—the first Lord Forbes.[1] At the same time the Mar account of 1451 indicates that Coull had been liferented by the Countess of Buchan, and only came into the King's hands at her death.[2] The fermes of Oneil and Coull are stated at £28, 13s. 4d. from 1455 to 1459, and in 1460 at £29, 6s. 8d.[3]

Kintore.—The thanage of Kintore on Donside, though granted by Robert Bruce to Robert of Keith, was in succeeding reigns, in whole or in part, in the hands of the Crown; and in 1375 and 1383 was granted as a barony to John Dunbar Earl of Moray.[4] In 1436 it was in ward by the death of James Earl of Moray, and the rents received by Lord Gordon.[5] In 1442, on the marriage of Elizabeth, the younger daughter and co-heir of the last named Earl of Moray, to Archibald Douglas, Kintore was conveyed to her and her husband and the heirs-male of their bodies, with a remainder to the issue-male of Archibald and his father, and only failing them to Elizabeth's heirs.[6] After the Douglas forfeitures the fermes of the thanage of Kintore are included in the Crown accounts, and on the first mention of them are said to be so "per forisfacturam Elizabeth de Dunbar olim comitisse Murravie."[7]

Countess Elizabeth is not included in the general attainder, and must therefore have been forfeited by a separate act. The ferme sa returned at £45. A terce from them, due to another Countess of Moray, to whom we shall presently have to refer, is drawn by her husband, Sir John Ogilvy.[1] There is a mair of Kintore, who gets a mark yearly.

Other lands between Dee and Spey.—Among Crown lands between Dee and Spey mentioned in the accounts are Abernethy,[2] a portion of Badenoch which seems to have been retained when it fell to the Crown by the death of Alexander Earl of Buchan in 1349 without lawful issue; whose fermes were £20, and which is among the annexed lands of 1455; and Abergeldy, a part of the earldom of Mar when granted in 1358–9 by Earl Thomas to Duncan son of Roger,[3] but separate from it in the reign of James II. The Douglas attainders brought to the Crown Crimond, forfeited by the Earl of Ormond, one-half of which was bestowed on John Dunbar,[4] and the other on Sir William Monypenny;[5] also Balveny, Boharm, and Botriphnie, lands of John Douglas, the money fermes of which vary in the accounts from £25, 0s. 10d. to £73, 8s., besides $17\frac{3}{4}$ marts and as many muttons.[6] The castle of Balveny was at first given into the hands of Lord Glammis,[1] but before the end of the reign the whole three possessions were bestowed on the King's half-brother, John Stewart Earl of Athole.[2] In the same neighbourhood were Kininmont, Bochrum, and half Clunymore, which had lapsed to the Crown by the bastardy of David Garden, established by a great assize at Aberdeen in the reign of James I.,[3] and which were bestowed in liferent on Sir William Forbes of Kinaldy,[4] and afterwards occupied by the Earl of Huntly.[5]

Frequent allusions occur to subjects in Banffshire escheat by the forfeiture of Sir William Lindsay of Rossy, a nephew of the first Earl of Crawford,[6] an event, apparently, of the reign of James I. These include Blareschenach near Banff, the crofts of Cullen, and certain annualrents from Ord, Monbrey, Baldavy, and Petnabrunyeane.[7]

A few words of explanation are desirable regarding a series of entries about a third (or a fourth) of Drumblate, Towie, and other lands, which were in ward from 1436 to 1440 by the death of William Fenton of Baky,[8] and after falling again into the hands of the Crown in 1458 by the forfeiture of the wife of Sir James Douglas of Lochleven, who with her husband had escaped to England, were bestowed on Sir David Stewart of Rossyth.[1] No Sir James Douglas of Lochleven appears at that date in the family pedigree: the person so designed is Sir James Douglas of Ralston, younger son of Sir William, and brother of Sir Henry Douglas of Lochleven, whom the Asloan MS. and the continuator of Bower alluded to as one of the combatants in a joust with the three knights of Burgundy in February 1448–9.[2] Drumblate and Towie were among the lands which this Sir James acquired by marriage with Janet, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Walter Fenton of Baky. That he was a supporter of the Earl of Douglas's faction is suggested by the occurrence of his name in an English safe-conduct obtained by Earl William on 12th May 1451, at which time the latter was intriguing with the Yorkists:[3] notwithstanding which we find him (under the designation of Sir James Douglas of Lugton) despatched by James II. on an embassy to the French court in 1456;[4] but he and his wife were afterwards attainted for complicity in the Douglas rising.[5] They had a son Henry, designed of Kilbirny or Culbirny, in Inverness-shire.[1]

With regard to the second tithes of the Bishop of Aberdeen, so often mentioned in the accounts between Dee and Spey, reference is made to the remarks on that subject in the prefaces of two former volumes of this series.[2]

Earldom of Moray.—The accounts of the Crown lands beyond the Spey, of which the principal is the earldom of Moray, are rendered by David Stewart, rector of Spynie and afterwards Bishop of Moray, William Thane of Cawdor, and Thomas Carmichael, canon of Moray. During the last two years of the reign Carmichael accounts for all lands north of the Mounth, including Mar as well as Moray. The Moray accounts have been already repeatedly referred to in connection with the light which they throw on the movements of James II. during the last few years of his reign.

The territory erected by Robert Bruce into an earldom in favour of his nephew Thomas Randolph comprised the larger part of the modern counties of Elgin, Nairn, and Inverness. The customs of Inverness were included, though the burgh and castle were reserved to the King. The burghs of Elgin, Forres, and Nairn were expressly granted, reserving the liberties of the burgesses, who were to hold of the Earl instead of the King. The earldom of Moray bestowed by Robert II. on his son-in-law John Dunbar in 1372 was rather more limited in extent. It excluded Lochaber, Badenoch, the castle and barony of Urquhart, and also the customs contained in Bruce's charter. The limitation was to the heirs of the body of John Dunbar and Marjory, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the elder brother of the former, George Earl of March.[1] Earl John was succeeded by a son and grandson, and then by another grandson, son of his younger son, Alexander Dunbar of Frendraught. This last Earl James, who died near the end of the reign of James I., had two daughters, Janet, wife of the eldest son of Chancellor Crichton, and Elizabeth, who married Archibald Douglas, third son of the 7th, and brother of the 8th and 9th Earls of Douglas. In terms of the investiture the earldom, i.e., the dignity with one half the lands and the principal messuage, would have been inherited by the elder sister Janet. There may, however, have been an intervening re-grant on a resignation, of which we have no record, narrowing the limitation to heirs-male, the effect of which would have been, on the death of Earl James Dunbar, to carry the earldom to the Crown, as coming in place of the attainted Earl of March; or pressure may have been put on the elder sister to resign in favour of the younger. We, in the first instance, find the husband of the younger sister, Archibald Douglas, designed—whether in his own right or his wife's—Earl of Moray, when made conservator of the truce with England, on 3rd November 1449 and 16th September 1451, and also on the 30th May 1453, where, however, the name may have been merely transcribed from the former documents.[1] But the death of William Earl of Douglas by the King's hand, in 1451–2 led to open hostilities between the King and the Douglases; and at the Parliament of June 1452, Sir James Crichton, husband of the elder sister, was "belted" Earl of Moray.[2] The Earl of Douglas's submission took place on 28th August following, and his brother seems at the same time to have re-possessed himself of the earldom of Moray, though not without his right being disputed. On 12th May 1453, Archibald Douglas Earl of Moray is included in a safe-conduct to his brother; and on the 30th of the same month his name again occurs similarly designed as conservator of the truce.[3] On the other hand, James Lord Crichton is called Earl of Moray in the Exchequer accounts, both in July 1454 in his lifetime, and after his death in 1456;[4] and his widow is designed Countess of Moray in a document in the Erroll charter chest.[5] But the actual possession of the earldom seems to have continued throughout with Archibald Douglas, who fell, as has been related, at Arkinholm on 1st May 1452.

But whatever was the state of the investitures, Elizabeth Dunbar, on the first blush of her widowhood, had hoped to escape attainder, and to be treated as if the fee of the earldom of Moray was in herself; and on 20th May 1455, only nineteen days after Arkinholm, we find her at Forres, entering into a rather remarkable agreement, to which the other parties were Alexander Earl of Huntly, and George Master of Huntly, his son. The Master of Huntly is to take her to wife, it being provided that a papal dispensation is to be obtained "in all goodly haste in the sickerest form, of all impediments that appears, or may appear betwixt them, so that they may lawfully complete the said marriage; and in the meantime he shall not constrain the said lady," to live with him as his wife, "but of her free will." Darnaway Castle is to be retained by the Countess, but Lochindorb is to be delivered up to the Earl of Huntly; the Countess's minor son and heir James (whose existence is ignored in the ordinary genealogies), is to be secured against "bodily harm to his life;" the Countess is not to be compelled to alienate the earldom from her "heirs gotten;" and her husband is to "make her sicker at the power of our Sovereign Lord the King to be undisturbed in the possession of her earldom."[1]

It falls to be noted with regard to this matrimonial contract, that according to the accepted genealogies of the Dunbar and Gordon families, Countess Elizabeth of Moray was niece of her intended husband; hence perhaps the stringency of the provision for a dispensation. Such a connection was, however, at that date so much without precedent in Scotland that the editor is greatly disposed to doubt whether the common belief that Elizabeth's mother was Lady Janet Gordon is well founded. All the evidence which he has discovered bearing on the question is adverse to that supposition. In any case, however, the marriage took place in all haste, without waiting for the dispensation. But the King in the meantime had proved strong enough, not only to get decree of attainder pronounced against Archibald Douglas and his wife, but to seize Moray as falling under their escheat, to set on foot the demolition of the island fortress of which Huntly was to have taken possession,[1] and to bestow the earldom on his infant son David.[2] Elizabeth's altered fortunes materially changed Huntly's views; the absence of a dispensation made it easy to get the marriage of his son and heir dissolved, with the view of forming for him a more brilliant alliance with a daughter of royalty. The Master of Huntly married the King's youngest sister; and in the course of time, as has been seen, that marriage also was dissolved on the ground of affinity within the prohibited degrees, the affinity in question being the relationship in the third and fourth degree of Lady Annabella and Elizabeth Countess of Moray.[1]

In the Moray accounts of this volume the Countess Elizabeth receives an annuity, at first not exceeding £20, but afterwards raised to £50.[2] In the following reign she enters into a third marriage with Sir John Colquhoun of Luss, to whom, as her husband, her pension is paid in 1463 and succeeding years.[3]

But another Countess of Moray, who must be carefully distinguished from her, appears in this volume and onwards to 1469 as the recipient of terce from the fermes of the earldom. She is further designed wife of Sir John Ogilvy of Lintrathen.[4] And though both classes of payments sometimes bear to be made to Sir John Ogilvy,[5] it becomes evident after 1463 that the entries relate to two different ladies, inasmuch as while Sir John Colquhoun is, as has been seen, expressly called husband of the one lady, Sir John Ogilvy is as explicitly asserted, during the same period, to be the husband of the other.[1] The tercer must therefore have been widow of James Dunbar Earl of Moray; and the circumstance that Elizabeth received her annuity through Ogilvy, suggests the probability that Ogilvy's wife was rather mother than stepmother of Elizabeth. Her Christian name never occurs in the rolls. Two interesting documents in the Airlie charter chest however establish that it was Margaret, and also that she was married to Ogilvy at least as early as 1447; but they throw no light on her paternity.[2]

The lands of the earldom of Moray, which are twice enumerated in full detail,[3] included,—1, lands in the sheriffdom of Elgin; 2, lands in the sheriffdom of Forres; 3, the lordship of Glencharny, lying along the Dalnain Water, a tributary of the Spey; and 4, Leffaris, Ballokhill, and other lands in the sheriffdom of Inverness, lying along the banks of Loch Ness. The money rental of each of these four different divisions of the earldom, as given at the audit of 1460, is £154, 15s. 5d., £118, 10s., £60, and £71, 16s. 8d. respectively.[4] But as the rents of Leffaris include those of Bonach and Bannachare, Crown property before the Douglas forfeiture (£20), and the Earl of Ormond's land of Duffus (£24) is included in the rents in the sheriffdom of Moray, the gross rental of the earldom of Moray was only £339, 18s. 8d. The receipts from the earldom also included 17 chalders wheat, 6 chalders 11 bolls 2 firlots oats, with 15 marts paid for at 5s. a head, and as many muttons paid for at 1s. a head.[1]

The annuities with which the fermes of Moray are charged are not without historic interest, particularly one, which takes back to a remote age, being paid under a foundation of King Alexander II., "pro anima quondam regis Duncani et omnium fidelium."[2]

Other lands beyond Spey.—The lands beyond Spey which had come to the Crown by the attainder of the Earl of Ormond and John Douglas of Balveny were in part possessions which the Douglases had inherited from the Morays of Bothwell. The country between the Moray and Cromarty Firths, known as the Black Isle (including also Dunscathe, on the north side of the Ferry of Cromarty), is referred to in the accounts as Avach and Eddirdule, or more generally Ardmannoch. This district belonged to Sir Andrew Moray, the husband of Christian Bruce, and was owned successively by his sons John and Thomas. Through the marriage in 1362 of Archibald Lord of Galloway, afterwards third Earl of Douglas, with Joan Moray (who, unless the designation be erroneous in the papal dispensation printed by Theiner,[1] was widow, not daughter, of Thomas Moray), Avach as well as Bothwell passed to the Douglas family. The charter by which Hugh Douglas was made Earl of Ormond, and had, according to Hume of Godscroft, "sundry lands given him by the King in Tweeddale and Ross," is unrecorded. His title was derived from the castle of Avach, on the moot hill of Ormond, an eminence near Castletown Point, on the Bay of Munlochy, otherwise called Douglas Castle. Eddirdule had also its fortalice, called the Redcastle. The gross rent of Ardmannach is stated in 1460 to be £172, 15s. 8d., with 10 chalders 9 bolls barley or malt, the same amount of oatmeal, 12¼ marts, and as many muttons.[2]

One-third of Duffus, in the sheriffdom of Elgin, was among the possessions forfeited by the Earl of Ormond.[3] Duffus seems to have been acquired by Sir Reginald Cheyne in the thirteenth century through marriage with the senior of two Moray co-heiresses. It was again parted on Cheyne's death among his three daughters, of whom one married Nicholas Sutherland, another Sir Robert Keith the Marischal, and the remaining third part came in some way to the Douglases. Its rent was £24 in money, 8 chalders barley, 3 marts and

3 muttons, besides 1 chalder 10 bolls $2\frac{1}{4}$ firlots malt, and the same amount of oatmeal from Kintra.[1]

Petty and Brachly, lying along the south shores of the Beauly Firth, and Strathdearn (Strathern) or the valley of the Findhorn, were also Douglas possessions inherited through the Morays of Bothwell, the property before his attainder of John Douglas of Balveny. The rent of Strathdearn in 1460 was £53, 6s. 8d.; of Petty and Brachly, £80, 6s. 8d., with $10\frac{3}{4}$ marts and as many muttons.[2] In 1456 Petty and Brachly were in the occupation of the M'Intoshes.[3] The fermes of Petty were chargeable with an annuity of eight marks to the chaplain of the Holy Rood in Elgin Cathedral, founded "per quondam dominum de Moravia,"[4] evidently not an Earl of Moray, but a Moray of Bothwell.

Other Crown possessions included in the accounts beyond Spey, are Bonach and Bannachare,[5] westward of Inverness and beyond the river Ness; and the barony and castle of Urquhart with Glenmoriston[6] on the west side of Loch Ness, all which are among the annexations of 1455. Before 1454 Bonach and Bannachare were let to Robert Stewart, who in the account of 1456 is allowed to occupy them rent free.[7] One half of Bonach and Banna-chare was in 1458 granted for life to Janet Stewart, wife of Lachlan M'Gillane.[1]

The fortress of Urquhart was included in Thomas Randolph's earldom of Moray, but excluded from the earldom conferred on John Dunbar. Robert II. granted it to his son David Earl of Strathern,[2] who in 1385 made complaint to the Council that his brother the "Wolf of Badenoch" kept forcible possession of it;[3] and in 1398 it was determined that it should be placed in the King's hands till order should be restored to the country.[4] In 1429 and 1448, Urquhart Castle was repaired and provisioned by the Crown,[5] and in 1452 we find the young Earl of Ross taking possession of it.[6] Notwithstanding their inclusion in the Annexation Act of August 1455, Urquhart and Glenmoriston are immediately afterwards bestowed in liferent on the Earl of Ross,[7] with the custody of Urquhart Castle.[8]

In the same accounts appear the rents of Strathnairn, in ward by the death in 1453 of Alexander fourth Earl of Crawford.[9] Strathnairn has been supposed to be part of the dowry received by the first Earl with the daughter of Robert II.; but the early date (1380) at which it is found in possession of the Lindsay family renders this unlikely. The mother of the first Earl was Katherine Stirling, heiress of Glenesk; and the marriage of Alexander Stirling with the daughter and heir of Friskin of Kerdale, to whom part at least of Strathnairn belonged, seems to suggest a probable explanation of its acquisition. While the accounts do not distinctly say that Strathnairn was in ward to the King as Earl of Moray, there seems to be no doubt that this was the case. Strathnairn was one of the subjects included in a charter of Robert II. to the first Earl of Crawford,[1] undated, but before 1384, in which year a dispute having arisen whether it was to be held from the King or from the King's son-in-law, John Earl of Moray, the matter was arranged by a compromise, to which the King was to interpose his authority.[2] That the Earl of Moray continued superior may be concluded from the absence of all mention of this ward till after the Douglas forfeitures, although Earl Alexander died in 1453, and other lands of his appear as in ward in the accounts of 1444 and 1455. Its fermes were £60, 13s. 4d., burdened with payments of two Countesses, Marjory daughter of Alexander Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, widow of David third Earl, and Margaret daughter and heir of Sir David Dunbar, widow of "Earl Beardie."[3] Certain lands of Thomas

Fraser of Lovat, viz., Ard, Strathglass, Abertarf, and Strathardok, of the annual value of £144, with others in the sheriffdom of Inverness and Nairn, were also in ward to the King as Earl of Moray; and the ward and marriage of the heir are granted to Lord Glammis, whose daughter was afterwards his wife.[1]

In the accounts of 1460 are contained the fermes of the See of Moray during the vacancy which occurred by the death of Bishop John Wincester, on the 1st of April of that year. The lands of the Bishops of Moray comprised six baronies,—Keith, Rafford, Birnie, Kynneder, Strathspey, Fothirface, and Kilmiles,—and their rent for the term of Whitsunday 1460 was £207, 11s.[2]

Earldom of Lennox.—Duncan Earl of Lennox was executed in 1425, but no sentence of attainder seems to have been passed against him. Of his three daughters and co-heirs, the eldest, Isabel, had been married to Murdach Duke of Albany, whose attainder would, by the Scottish treason law, have barred the succession of his issue even to their mother. In the discussions on this subject, it has generally been assumed that Isabel outlived all her children and their legitimate issue;[3] and she seems to have survived till towards the end of the reign of James II. During the reign of James I., she was a prisoner in Tantallon Castle, and the rents of Lennox were enjoyed by the Crown, not apparently as escheat, but as in non-entry. After the accession of James II. she was allowed to occupy her island castle of Inchmurrin, and exercise in some measure her feudal rights as Countess of Lennox. In the account of the Sheriff of Stirling of 1456, the Countess of Lennox is mentioned as receiving the fermes of Glorat when in non-entry instead of the King, "super quo consulendus est rex."[1] In 1459, the Countess being probably dead, we have the charge side of an account of the chamberlain of the earldom of Lennox,[2] who is also chamberlain of the King's lands in Stirlingshire; and we elsewhere learn that the fermes of that earldom are appropriated to the works then going on at Stirling Castle.[3]

ACT OF PARLIAMENT OF 4TH AUGUST 1455, ANNEXING CERTAIN LANDS TO THE CROWN.

As there are some erroneous readings of names in all the various texts of this Act hitherto printed, including even that in the usually unimpeachable record edition of the Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, its provisions are here reprinted from the original record in the General Register House :—

Compotum Jacobi Schawe, vicecomitis de Kynros, redditum apud Edinburgh decimotercio die mensis Septembris anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimosexto, de omnibus receptis suis et expensis per firmas et exitus ballie sue a secundo die mensis Augusti anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquinti, et sic de duobus terminis infra hoc compotum.

Idem onerat se, in primis, de xxvij ℔. xij ʃ. iiij đ., restantibus et pendentibus in ultimo compoto suo, ut patet in pede ejusdem, de quibus in arreragiis existunt tres libre quatuor denarii, et in pendenciis vigintiquatuor libre duodecim solidi. Summa arreragiorum et pendenciarum patet.

Item, idem onerat se de vj ʃ. viij đ. per vendicionem unius paris calcarium deauratorum debiti annuatim de terris de Estircollennochy et Myddilcollennochy ad festum Sancte Mergarete regine, de anno compoti. Et de iij đ. albe firme de quadam parte terrarum de Kynros cum hostilagio ejusdem, debite per tres sorores Alexandri de Kynros defuncti. Summa hujus oneris, vj ʃ. xj đ.

Item, idem onerat se de xxix ℔. vj ʃ. viij đ. de firmis terrarum dominicalium de Burle et Tulery de anno compoti, que sunt de proprietate domini regis. Et de iiij ℔. xiij ʃ. iiij đ., de firmis terrarum de Schanell, de dicto anno et eadem proprietate. Et de iiij ℔. xiij ʃ. iiij đ. de firmis terrarum de Hiltoun, de eisdem proprietate et anno.

Et de vj ℔., de firmis terrarum et molendini de Quhorth, de anno et proprietate supradictis. Summa hujus oneris, xliiij ℔. xiij ʃ. iiij đ.

Summa totalis oneracionis preter arreragia, xlv ℔. iij đ.

Summa totalis oneracionis cum arreragiis, lxxij ℔. xij ʃ. vij đ.

Et non onerat se de warda terrarum de Culboy, existencium in manibus regis per mortem quondam Alexandri de Kynros, quia dominus Henricus Douglas occupavit et occupat easdem post mortem dicti quondam Alexandri, licet idem Alexander obierit vestitus et saisitus de eisdem et in possessione earundem, super quo consulendus est rex. Nec de aliquibus aliis wardis, releviis, maritagiis, finibus, eschaetis, aut quarumcunque curiarum exitibus, quia nichil plus accidit infra tempus compoti, ut asserit compotans suo juramento.

Consulendus est rex.

Expense ejusdem. In primis, allocate compotanti pro duabus terciis debitis quondam matri et uxori quondam Johannis Stewart, tunc de Burle, de eodem dominio, et anno compoti, xv ℔. vj ʃ. viij đ. Et allocate eidem de firmis terrarum dominicalium de Burle et de Tulery, quas dominus rex contulit per cartam infeodacionis Michaeli de Balfour, prout facta fuit fides super compotum, xxix ℔. vj ʃ. viij đ. Summa expensarum, xliiij ℔. xiij ʃ. iiij đ. Et sic restant xxvij ℔. xix ʃ. iij đ. De quibus, pendent de arreragiis compoti domini Johannis Cokburn tempore quo ministravit in officio dicti vicecomitatus, ut patet in pede ultimi compoti sui, ix ℔. xiij ʃ. iiij đ., de quibus deonerandus est compotans, quia nichil distringibile habet infra balliam compotantis, et onerandus est vicecomes de Fyffe. Et de qua summa restante allocatur compotanti per liberacionem factam Alexandro Napar, tunc compotorum rotulatori, fatenti receptum super compotum, et de quibus reddidit compotum, de firmis dictarum terrarum de Burle, vij ℔. xix ʃ. ij đ. Summa hujus allocacionis et exoneracionis, xvij ℔. xij ʃ. vj đ. Et sic restant x ℔. vj ʃ. ix đ. tam, vj ℔., pro quibus respondebit. Summa hujus expense patet. Et sic debet unacum duodecim solidis et duobus denariis cum quibus omisit se onerare de firmis terrarum quarte partis hostilagii de Kynrosse, per saisinam datam Mergarete de Kynrosse de eadem, iiij ℔. xviij ß. xj đ.

Edynburgh.

Compotum quondam Alexandri de Ramysay, filii et tunc heredis apparentis Alexandri Ramysay de Daluolsy, militis, vicecomitis de Edynburgh, redditum ibidem per Thomam Prestoune, deputatum ejusdem medie warde, et Patricium Cokburn, warde de Hadyngtoun, decimoquinto die mensis Septembris anno Domini M°IIII^{c} quinquagesimosexto, de omnibus receptis suis et expensis per firmas et exitus ballie sue a decimo septimo die mensis Julii anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquarti usque in diem hujus compoti, et sic de duobus annis infra hoc compotum.

Idem onerat se, in primis, de xlvij ℔. xx đ., restantibus et debitis in pede compoti quondam domini Jacobi Crechtoun, comitis Moravie, ut patet in pede ejusdem. Summa arreragii dicti domini Jacobi patet.

Item, idem onerat se de x ß. redditus assise terre de Pulterland de duobus terminis Purificacionis beate Marie Virginis infra hoc compotum, quia tunc redditur tantum. Et de ij libris piperis terre de Randalstoune de dictis duobus annis. Et de vj đ. per vendicionem duarum librarum gummi redditus assise de terra de Dubbis, tenementi de Crawmond, de eisdem annis. Et de xvj đ. albe firme terre de Drem, spectantis Archibaldo de Neutoune, de eisdem annis. Et de ij đ. albe firme terre de Cragmillare de eisdem annis. Et de viij đ. de duobus paribus albarum cerothecarum albe firme terre de Middiltoune de eisdem annis. Et de iij ß. iiij đ. per vendicionem quinque amplarum sagittarum albe firme terrarum de Blans et Ugstoune de eisdem annis. Et de ij đ. albe firme terre de Cranstoune Riddal de eisdem annis. duorum parium calcarium deauratorum albe firme terre de Neuhal de eisdem annis. Et de ij đ. albe firme terre de Wrichtishouse de eisdem annis. Summa hujus oneris, xxx ß. iiij đ. ij libre piperis.

Item, idem onerat se de xlv ℔. per castriwardam medie warde ballie compotantis, debitam ad festum Purificacionis nostre Domine tantum, de duobus annis infra hoc compotum. Et de lj ℔. xix ß. iiij đ. per castriwardam constabularie de Hadingtoun de dictis terminis Purificacionis infra hoc compotum. Summa hujus oneris, lxxxxvj ℔. xix ß. iiij đ.

Item, idem onerat se de ij đ. per duplicacionem albe firme terrarum de Wrichtishouse, per saisinam datam Johanni Napare de eisdem. Et de v ℔. de relevio terrarum de Gilbertoune, per saisinam datam magistro Georgio de Crechtoun, preposito ecclesie collegiate ejusdem, de eisdem. Et de ij đ. per duplicacionem albe firme terrarum de Wrichtishouse per saisinam datam Alexandro Napar de eisdem. Et de lij ß. de firmis terrarum de Gammylschelis et duabus acris vocatis Gudisacris infra constabulariam de Hadingtoune, existentibus in manibus domini regis, saisina non recuperata de eisdem, de termino Sancti Martini. Et de ij đ. albe firme dictarum terrarum per saisinam datam Johanni Fostar de eisdem. Et de ij libris piperis per duplicacionem albe firme terre de Louranstoune per saisinam datam Johanni Louranstoune de eadem. Summa hujus oneris, vij ℔. xij ß. vj đ. ij libre piperis.

Item, idem onerat se de lxxx ℔., per exitus unius itineris justiciarie tenti infra balliam compotantis mense Januarii anni Domini etc. quinquagesimitercii, de quibus dictus quondam dominus Jacobus Crechtoun omisit se onerare in ultimo compoto suo, ut patet in pede ejusdem, eo quod tempore dicti compoti non recepit extractum ejusdem. Et de l ℔., per exitus unius itineris justiciarie tenti infra dictam balliam vicesimoseptimo die mensis Januarii anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquarti. Summa utriusque itineris, j^{c}xxx ℔., absque eschaetis Thome Malwil de eodem decretis in dicto ultimo itinere, et eschaetis Nevini

De eschaetis subscriptorum inquirendum.

Michelsoune, convicti et justificati pro murthro, Gille Hude, eciam justificati pro communi furto, et bonis Andree Cuke arestatis, videlicet una vacca cum jumento et arconio granorum, de quibus omnibus inquirendum est per compotantem, et distringendum et inducendum, et eciam de bonis dicti Thome Malwil arestatis in primo itinere presentis compoti.

Et non onerat se de aliquibus aliis wardis, releviis, maritagiis, finibus, eschaetis, aut exitibus curiarum suarum aut camerarie, quia nichil plus accidit infra tempus compoti, ut asserit compotans medio suo juramento.

Summa totalis oneracionis preter arreragia, ij^{c}xxxvj ℔. ij ß. ij đ. et iiij libre piperis. Summa totalis oneracionis cum arreragiis, ij^{c}lxxxiij ℔. iij ß. x đ. et iiij libre piperis, absque eschaetis supradictis, et absque viginti marcis terrarum quondam Walteri de Douglas in territorio de Craumond Regis, existencium in manibus regis, saisina non recuperata de eisdem, per spacium duorum annorum. Et sic summa totalis oneracionis extendit ad ij^{c}lxxxxvj ℔. x ß. vj đ. et iiij libras piperis.

Expense ejusdem. In primis, allocate compotanti pro expensis justiciariorum dicti ultimi itineris, xxiij ℔., quia, licet dicte expense extendebant ad triginta tres libras, receperunt decem libras de eschaeta bonorum Thome Malwil de eodem, que non sunt in onere supradicto, et sic dicta summa triginta trium librarum expensarum justiciariorum existit computanti plenarie allocata. Et eidem, per solucionem factam Fratribus Minoribus de Hadingtone, percipientibus annuatim viginti marcas de castriwardis ballie de Hadingtoune ex elimosina regis antiqua, gardiano dictorum Fratrum per literas suas patente receptum super compotum, de duobus annis hujus compoti, xxvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij đ. Et allocati computanti de feodifirma terrarum de Pultirland, debita de duobus terminis hujus compoti per Alexandrum Napar, x ß., eo quod dictus Alexander deliberavit Willelmo Bonar, tunc compotorum rotulatori, ut patet in compoto suo, quatuor libras, de pede compoti dicti Alexandri, cum solum debuisset tres libras et sex solidos, ut patet in dicto pede compoti ejusdem. Et allocati computanti pro diversis expensis factis in transmissione literarum domini regis pro congregacionibus ad exercitum, de mandato domini regis, xvj ß. viij đ. Summa expensarum lj ℔. Et sic restant ij^{c}xlv ℔. x ß. vj đ. et iiij libre piperis. De quibus, pendent super quondam dominum Jacobum Crechtoun, tunc vicecomitem de Edinburgh, in pede compoti sui ultimo redditi, xlvij ℔. xx đ. Et pendent similiter super quondam Alexandrum Ramysay, tunc vicecomitem de Edynburgh, de castriwardis et redditibus assise de primo anno hujus compoti per eum receptis, xxxv ℔. xiij ß. ij đ. Et similiter pendent de exitibus unius itineris justiciarie tenti infra balliam compotantis anno Domini etc. quinquagesimotercio, eo quod non recepit extractum dicti itineris, lxxx ℔., sed nunc liberatur extractus dicti itineris compotanti, et precipitur levare dictam summam, cum qua onerabitur in proximo compoto suo. Summa hujus pendencie, j^{c}lxij ℔. xiiij ß. x đ. Et sic restant lxxxij ℔. xv ß. viij đ. De qua summa, allocate computanti de firmis terrarum quondam Walteri Douglas infra territorium de Crawmond Regis, concessis per dominum regem Johanni Liddale per literas suas sub privato, testante magistro Thoma Waus, custode privati sigilli, de duobus annis hujus compoti, xiij ℔. vj ß. viij đ. Et Patricio Cokburn et Thome Prestoune, ministrantibus in officio vicecomitis medie warde et constabularie de Hadingtoune, pro laboribus et feodis eorum, de exitibus itinerum justiciarie de ultimo anno compoti, ex consideracione auditorum ad presens, xiij ℔. vj ß. viij đ. Et eidem Patricio, per solucionem factam Fratribus Minoribus de Dunde, percipientibus annuatim decem marcas de castriwardis constabularie de Hadingtoune ex elimosina regis antiqua, ut patet in antiquis rotulis precedentibus, de ultimo anno hujus compoti, sub periculo compotantis, vj ℔. xiij ß. iiij đ. Summa harum expensarum, xxxiij ℔ vj ß. viij đ. Et sic restant xlix ℔. ix ß.

Onerandus in proximo compoto.

Et memorandum, quod nulla hic allocacio fuit facta de decimo denario debito domino abbati Sancte Crucis de Edinburgh, quia summa de quibus solvenda est decima eidem pendet super compotantem, et de qua summa, dum inducent in proximo compoto suo, decimus denarius debitus eidem erit allocandus.

De qua summa quadraginta novem librarum novem solidorum superius restante, allocate compotanti per remissionem factam per dominum regem de tribus amerciamentis in quibus Andreas Pilmour, Thomas Frude, et Johannes Joffray inciderunt in itinere justiciarie tento apud Edinburgh infra tempus compoti, ut patet per duas literas domini regis sub signeto et subscripcione, unam videlicet respectuacionis dictorum amerciamentorum et aliam remissionis eorundem, ostensas super compotum, xxx ℔. Summa hujus allocacionis patet. Et sic restant xix ℔. ix ß. De qua summa, soluti domino Niniano, compotorum rotulatori, recipienti super compotum, v ß. Et Fratribus Minoribus de Dunde, percipientibus annuatim decem marcas de castriwardis constabularie de Hadingtoun, ut patet in antiquis rotulis compotorum, sub periculo compotantis, de anno compoti, vj ℔. xiij ß. iiij đ. Summa hujus expense, vj ℔. xviij ß. iiij đ. Et sic restant xij ℔. x ß. viij đ. De quibus, pendent de castriwarda baroniarum de Roslyn, Cowsland, et Pentland, in manibus comitis Orchadie, iiij ℔. Et similiter pendent de castriwarda baronie de Crechtoun et de Castellaw, l ß. Summa pendencie, vj ℔. x ß. Et sic restant vj ℔. viij đ., preter unam marcam de castriwardis constabularie de Hadingtoun, que non continetur in onere suo supradicto, sed onerandus est in proximo compoto.

Respondebit Ninianus Spot.

Restant.

Onerandus est compotans.

Lynlithqw. per firmas et exitus ballie sue a die quarto mensis Octobris anni Domini etc. LVI^ti^ usque in diem hujus compoti, et sic de duobus terminis infra hoc compotum.

Iidem onerant se, in primis, de v^c^lxxvj ℔. iiij ß. x d. per integras firmas comitatis Marchie et baronie de Dunbar per tempus compoti. Summa oneris patet.

Item, iidem onerant se de v ℔. per annuos redditus et albas firmas terrarum predictarum de anno compoti, prout hec et omnia superius descripta patent particulariter in compoto anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquinti. Et de xxij ℔. ij ß. iiij d. per integras castriwardas ballie sue, ut patet in compoto dicti anni particulariter. Summa hujus oneris, xxvij ℔. ij ß. iiij d.

Summa totalis oneracionis, vj^c^iij ℔. vij ß. ij d.

Et non onerat se de lxij ℔. xiij ß. iiij d. de firmis terrarum de Lethame et Marsyntoune anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquinti, et de Gradane de uno termino dicti anni, quia quondam David Chernsyde per dominum regem constitutus levator firmarum predictarum fuerat, prout patet in compoto anni supradicti, qui nichil inde solvit nec habet bona distringibilia, ergo recurrendum est ad terras heredis illius qui est infra etatem, ad quam etatem cum pervenerit distringende sunt terre illius pro summa supradicta. Nec de lxxxiij ℔. x ß. dictarum terrarum de Lethame et Marsyntoune de termino Penthecostes et Sancti Martini anni etc. quinquagesimitercii et termino Penthecostes anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquinti, que pendebant ex certis causis in compoto anni Domini etc. LV^ti^ expressatis. Nec de l ℔. xvij ß. x d. terrarum de Ersiltoune, eciam pendentibus in pede compoti anni etc. quinquagesimiquinti super dominum Willelmum Cranstoun de Corsby, militem. eciam pendentibus ut supra. Nec de v ℔. vj ß. viij ₫. terrarum de Cadscheil, occupatarum per Thomam Hume, pendentibus ut supra. Nec de iiij ℔. terrarum de Ernyslaw occupatarum per dictum David Hume, pendentibus ut supra. Quequidem terre predicte contente in non oneracione predicta, preter de Lethame, Mersyntoune, et Gradame, dicuntur concesse per cartas personis prius expressatis, et indiscrete, ut speratur, super quibus consulendus est rex, et cadunt sub revocacione. Consulendus est rex.

Item, idem non oneravit se de xv ℔. de firmis terrarum de Litilspot, occupatarum per Archibaldum de Dunbar, restantibus in compoto anni Domini etc. quinquagesimiquinti, ut patet in eodem. Nec de xx ℔. terrarum de Petcokkis, occupatarum per Patricium Dunbar de Bele, eciam restantibus in compoto dicti anni. Nec de x ℔. foreste de Dy, occupate per Patricium de Cokburn, et restantibus ut supra. Nec de xiij ℔. xvj ß. viij ₫. terrarum de Trafontanis, occupatarum per abbatem de Driburgh, restantibus ut supra. Nec de xl ℔. terrarum de Brigyhameschelis et Lochtoune, occupatarum per dictum dominum Alexandrum Hume, eciam restantibus ut supra. Nec de vj ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₫. terrarum de Hardennys, occupatarum per Walterum Spens, eciam restantibus ut supra. Super quibus consulendus est dominus rex, quia omnes iste terre in isto non onere contente fuerant date personis prefatis per quondam dominum Georgium de Dunbar ultimum post forisfacturam quondam patris sui, ergo per consequens spectant domino regi. Nota pro rege.

Item, iidem non onerant se de xvij ℔. ij ß. iiij ₫. de castriwardis terrarum de lez Merse, que spectabant ad levacionem dicti quondam David Chernsyde, restantibus ut supra in anno etc. quinquagesimoquinto. Nec de xliij ß. iiij ₫. annuorum reddituum infra dominium de le Merse, restantibus ut supra super dictum quondam David Chernside, pro quibus omnibus istius non oneris distringendus est heres dicti David cum venerit ad etatem et fortunam.
